Metastasio (mā-täs-tä'sē-ō); the assumed name of Pietro Antonio Domenico Bonaventura Trapassi. Born at Rome, Jan. 3, 1698: died at Vienna, April 12, 1782. A noted Italian poet, court poet at Vienna 1730–82. He was the author of numerous lyric dramas (various composers supplying the music for each): "Didone abbandonata" (1724), "Catone in Utica," "Ezio," "Semiramide," "Alessandro nell' Indie," "Artaserse," "Demetrio," "Adriano in Siria," "Olimpiade," "Demofoonte," "La clemenza di Tito" (1734), "Achille in sciro," "Antigono." "Il trionfo di Clelia," "Partenope," etc. Miscellaneous poems for cantatas, oratorios, etc. Burney wrote his memoirs (1796).

For a century and a half Italy had been unable to boast of her literary superiority; but, in producing Metastasio, nature seemed to have made her ample amends, as none of her writers ever more completely united all the qualities that constitute a poet: vivacity of imagination, and refinement of feeling, with every charm of versification and expression. Nor shall we easily find one who, by the mere force of his style, is entitled to be considered as a more graceful painter, or a more delightful musician.
Sismondi, Lit. of the South of Europe, I. 478.

Metauro (mā-tou'rō). A small river in Italy, which flows into the Adriatic 28 miles northwest of Ancona: the ancient Metaurus. The battle of the Metaurus was a victory gained at the river, south of Rimini, in 207 B. C., by the Romans under the consuls Livius and Nero over the Carthaginians under Hasdrubal. Nero had eluded Hannibal in southern Italy, and made a forced march of 250 miles with 7,000 men. Hasdrubal was slain, and his army nearly annihilated. This victory is ranked as one of the decisive battles of the world.

Meton (mē'ton). [Gr. Μέτων.] A Greek of the 5th century B. C., the discoverer of the Metonic cycle. See the extract.

Meton's cycle was corrected a hundred years later (330 B. C.) by Calippus, who discovered the error of it by observing an eclipse of the moon six years before the death of Alexander. In this corrected period, four cycles of 19 years were taken, and a day left out at the end of the 76 years, in order to make allowance for the hours by which, as already observed, 6940 days are greater than 19 years and than 235 lunations: and this Calippic period is used in Ptolemy's Almagest in stating observations of eclipses.
Whewell, Ind. Sciences, I. 190.

Metopes from the Temple of Hera at Selinus. Four metopes in the Museo Nazionale, Palermo, Sicily, representing Hercules fighting an Amazon, Zeus and Hera, Actæon and Artemis, and Athene and Enceladus. In Feb., 1831, he took charge of the congregation at Ware in Hertfordshire. In 1841 he established the "Nonconformist," and devoted his life to the advocacy of the freedom of religion from state control. In 1852 he was elected member of Parliament for Rochdale, and in 1868 served on the royal commission on education.

Miami (mī-ăm'ē). A tribe of North American Indians, first known in 1675 in southern Wisconsin. After several changes they settled, about 1680, on the St. Joseph River in southern Michigan, and afterward in treaty negotiations were considered as owners of the entire Wabash country and western Ohio. There is much confusion in literature between the Miami and the Illinois. The Pottawottomi translated the name 'crippled,' and the northern tribes called them "walkers"—the two epithets probably referring to their not using canoes. The English called them Twightwees, derived from their own name for them—Twa, which was an imitation of the crane's cry. Their present (1893) number is 374. See Algonquian.

Miami (mī-ăm'ī). A river in Ohio which joins the Ohio at the southwestern corner of the State. Length, over 150 miles.

Miani, or Meanee (mē-ā'nē). A village near Hyderabad, Sind, British India. Here, Feb. 17, 1843, Sir Charles J. Napier (with 2,800 men) defeated the army of Sind (30,000).

Miantonomoh (mi-an-tō-nō'mō). Died 1643. A sachem of the Narragansett Indians, nephew of Canonicus. He maintained friendly relations with the English, and in 1637 aided Connecticut and Massachusetts in defeating the Pequots. Having become involved in a war with Uncas, sachem of the Mohegans, he was defeated and captured by the latter in 1643, and was put to death in the same year, with the approval of the English, who claimed a protectorate over both tribes.

Miava (mē'o-vo). A town in the county of Neutra, Hungary, situated on the river Miava 46 miles northeast of Vienna. Population (1890), 9,997.

Micah (mī'kä). [Heb., 'who is like Jehovah'.] In Old Testament history: (a) An Ephraimite who stole and hid pieces of silver from his mother, but, alarmed by her imprecations on the thief, confessed the deed and returned the money: she thereupon dedicated it to the Lord, and made with it a graven and a molten image (teraphim), which Micah set up in his house and then hired a Levite as a priest. (b) A prophet, a native of Moresheth of Gath, near Eleutheropolis, and a contemporary of Isaiah. He is reckoned as the sixth of the minor prophets (the third in the Septuagint). He prophesied near the beginning of the reign of Hezekiah.

Micali (mē-kä'lē), Giuseppe. Born at Leghorn, Italy, about 1776: died at Florence, March 27, 1844. An Italian archæologist, author of "Storia degli antichi popoli d'Italia" (1832), etc.

Micawber (mi-kä'bėr), Wilkins. One of the principal characters in Dickens's "David Copperfield." He is remarkable for his rapid alternations of depression and elevation of spirits, his "temporary embarrassments of a pecuniary nature," and his constant persuasion that "something will turn up." His wife, as far as the elasticity of her spirits goes, is quite his equal. Her devotion to "the parent of her children and the father of her bills" is beyond all praise. Mr. Micawber exclaims, "I never will desert Mr. Micawber!" The couple appear to have been suggested more or less by Dickens's father and mother.

Michabo. The Great Hare, in Algonquian legends.

What Ioskeha was to the Iroquois, Michabo or Manibozho was to the Algonkin tribes. There has been a good deal of mystification about Michabo, or Manibozho, or Messou, who was probably from the first a hare sans phrase, but who has been converted by philological processes into a personification of light or dawn. It has already been seen that the wild North Pacific people recognize in their hero and demiurge animals of various species: dogs, ravens, muskrats, and coyotes have been found in this lofty estimation, and the Uncas people "Owan-ak, the ancestor of wolves." It would require some labour to derive all the ancient heroes and gods from misconceptions about the names of vast natural phenomena like light and dawn, and it is probable that Michabo, Gluskap, the Great Hare of the Algonkins, is only a successful apotheosised totem like the rest. His legend and his dominion are very widely spread. Dr. Brinton himself (1882) allows that the great hare is a totem. Perhaps our earliest authority about the mythical great hare in America is William Strachey's "Travaile" into Virginia. Lang, Myth, etc., ii. 54.

Michael (mī'kelor mī'kā-el). [Heb., 'who is like God!' F. Michel, It. Michele, Sp. Pg. Miguel, G. Michael.] An archangel mentioned in the Bible. He is regarded as the leader of the whole host of angels, and, owing to miraculous appearances recorded in Roman Catholic legends, is considered by that church to be the representative of the church triumphant. His feast occurs on Sept. 29 in that church and in the Anglican church also. In the Apocalypse of the same he is always as fighting: John mentions him as fighting at the head of the angels against the dragon and his host.

Probably, on the hint thus given by St. John, the Romish church has constituted an order of that Michael was employed, in command of the loyal angels of God, to overthrow and consign to the pit of perdition Lucifer and his rebellious associates—a legend which was at length embodied in Milton's noble poem "Paradise Lost." Sometimes Michael is represented as the side archangel, sometimes as only the head of a fraternity of archangels, which includes likewise Gabriel, Raphael, and various others. He is usually represented in coat-armour, with a glory round his head, and a dart in his hand, trampling on the fallen Lucifer. He has even been furnished, like the human warriors of the middle ages, with a heraldic ensign—namely, a banner hanging from a cross. We obtain a curious idea of the religious notions of those ages when we learn that the red-velvet-covered buckler worn by Michael in his war with Lucifer used to be shewn in a church in Normandy down to 1667, when the bishop of Avranches at length forbade its being any longer exhibited.

Chambers's Book of Days, II. 388.

Michael I, Rhangabe or Rhagabe. Died about 845. Byzantine emperor 811–813. He was the son of one of the high functionaries at court, and was made master of the palace by Nicephorus I., whose daughter Procopia he married. He succeeded his wife's brother Stauracius. He was deposed by Leo V., and retired to a convent.

Michael II, Balbus ('the Stammerer'). Byzantine emperor 820–829. He was of obscure origin, but rose to the highest dignities under Leo V., whom he had assisted in deposing Michael I., and whom he deposed in turn.

Michael III. Byzantine emperor 842–867, son of Theophilus. He undertook, with his uncle Bardas, an expedition against the Bulgarians in 863, which resulted in the conversion of the Bulgarian king. In 863 his uncle Petronas gained a splendid victory over the Saracens in Asia Minor. He was assassinated in 867 by Basilius the Macedonian, whom he had associated with himself in the government in 866.

Michael IV., surnamed "The Paphlagonian." Byzantine emperor 1034–41. He was a younger brother of John the Orphanotrophus, prime minister under Constantine IX. and Romanus III. He became chamberlain to Zoe, wife of Romanus III., who in 1034 poisoned her husband in order to marry Michael. He was a man of weak character, and was a mere instrument in the hands of his brother.

Michael V. Calaphates ('the Calker'). Byzantine emperor 1041–42, nephew of Michael IV. He banished his uncle John the Eunuch, which led to an insurrection at Constantinople. He was dethroned, and spent the rest of his life in a convent.

Michael VI, surnamed "The Warrior." Byzantine emperor 1056–57. He was appointed by the empress Theodora as her successor on account of his military virtues. He was, however, old and feeble, and was deposed by Isaac Comenus. He was allowed to retire to a convent.

Michael VII. Ducas or Parapinaces. Byzantine emperor 1071–78, son of Constantine XI.

Michael VIII. Palæologus. Born 1234: died in Dec., 1282. Byzantine emperor 1261–82, grandson through his mother Irene Angela) of the Byzantine emperor Alexius Angelus. He became commander of the French mercenaries in the service of the Emperor of Nicæa, and in 1259 became, with the patriarch Arsenius, guardian of the emperor John Lascaris. He caused himself to be proclaimed joint emperor of Nicæa in 1260. In 1261 he conquered Constantinople from the Latins, thus restoring the Byzantine empire, of which he was crowned emperor on the same year. He deposed and blinded John Lascaris in 1261.

Michael IX. Palæologus. Died 1320. Byzantine emperor 1295–1320, son and associate of Andronicus II. who outlived him.

Michael, Czar of Russia 1613–45. He was the founder of the Romanoff dynasty.

Michael, Born Oct. 25, 1832. Grand Duke of Russia, fourth son of the czar Nicholas.

Michael, A bark of 25 tons, one of the ships of Frobisher's first expedition. It early abandoned the other ship, the Gabriel, and returned to England.

Michael, Archangel. A celebrated painting by Guido Reni, in Santa Maria dei Cappuccini, Rome. The saint, bedaubed his beauty of face and form often called the "Catholic Apollo," is in the act of enchaining Lucifer. The color is vigorous and good.

Michael, Order of Saint. An order instituted in France by Louis XI., Aug. 1, 1469.

Michael Obrenovitch (o-brā-nō'vich), Prince of Servia. Born at Kragujevatz, Servia, Sept. 4, 1825: murdered near Belgrad, June 10, 1868. A younger son of Milosh. He reigned 1840–42 and 1860–68.

Michaelis (mē-chii-ä'lis), Johann David. Born at Halle, Prussia, Feb. 27, 1717: died at Göttingen, Aug. 22, 1791. A German biblical scholar, professor at Göttingen 1745–91. His works include an introduction to the New Testament (1788), "Supplementa" to Hebrew lexicons (1784–92), "Mosaisches Recht" (1770–71), etc.

Michaelmas Day. See the extract.

Michaelmas Day, the 29th of September, properly named the day of St. Michael and All Angels, is a great festival in the Church of Rome, and also observed as a feast by the Church of England. In England it is one of the four quarterly terms, or quarter-days on which rents are paid, and in that and other divisions of the United Kingdom, as well as perhaps in other countries, it is the day on which local magistracies and councils are reelected. The only other remarkable thing connected with the day is a widely prevalent custom of marking it with a goose at dinner.

Chambers's Book of Days, II. 387.

Michaelmas Terme. A play by Thomas Middleton, licensed and printed in 1607: a lively and effective comedy of city intrigue.

Michaud (mē-shō'), Joseph François. Born at Albens, Savoy, June 19, 1767: died at Passy, near Paris, Sept. 30, 1839. A French poet, historian, and Bourbon publicist. His principal historical works are "Histoire des progrès et de la chute de l'empire de Mysore," etc. (1801), "Histoire des croisades" (1812–17). With his brother L. G. Michaud he edited the "Biographie universelle."

Michaud, Louis Gabriel. Born at Boing, 1772: died at Ternes, March 13, 1858. A French littérateur, brother of J. F. Michaud, and his collaborator in editing the "Biographie universelle."

Michaux (mē-shō'), André. Born near Versailles, March 7, 1746: died in Madagascar, Nov. 13, 1802. A French botanist and traveler in Asia and America. He wrote a "Histoire des chênes de l'Amérique Septentrionale" (1801), "Flora Boreali-Americana" (1803), etc.

Michaux, François André. Born at Versailles, France, 1770: died near Pontoise, France, 1855. A French botanist, son of André Michaux. He wrote "Histoire des arbres forestiers de l'Amérique Septentrionale" (1810–13), etc.

Michel (mich'el), or Cousin Michel. A humorous personification of the German nation, as John Bull is of the English.

Michel (mich'el) of Northgate, Dan. A brother of the cloister of St. Austin at Canterbury. He is noted as having completed in 1340 a translation of "La somme des vices et des vertus," known as "the Ayenbite of Inwyt" (which see).

Michel (mē-shel'). Francisque Xavier. Born at Lyons, Feb. 18, 1809. A French archæologist, philologist, and historian, professor at Bordeaux: editor of Old French literature.

Michel (mē-shel'). Louise. Born 1839. A French anarchist. She opened a school in the Quartier Montmartre, Paris, in 1865. In 1871 she took part in the uprising of the Commune, and for this was sentenced in the same year to deportation for life to New Caledonia. She was released by the amnesty of 1880, and returned to Paris, where she became prominent as an anarchist. In March, 1883 she was sentenced to six years' imprisonment for inciting the poor to plunder the bakers' shops. She refused to accept a pardon in 1885. She is at present (1894) living in London.

Michelangelo (mī-kel-an'je-lō; It. pron. mē-kel-an'je-lō) (Michelagnolo Buonarroti). Born at Caprese, March 6, 1475: died at Rome, Feb. 18, 1564. A famous Italian sculptor, painter, architect, and poet. He came of an ancient but poor Florentine family. He was apprenticed to the painter Ghirlandajo April 1, 1488, and with other boys from the atelier began soon after to study the antique marbles collected by Lorenzo de' Medici in the garden of San Marco. Lorenzo discovered him there, and in 1489 took him into his palace, where he had every opportunity for improvement and study. The centaur relief in the Casa Buonarroti was made at this time, at the suggestion of Angelo Poliziano. In 1491 he came under the influence of Savonarola, whom he always held in great reverence. In 1492 Lorenzo died, and the brilliant intellectual circle with the Medici family terminated. In 1493 he made a large wooden crucifix for the prior of S. Spirito, and with the assistance of the prior began the colossal statue of Apollo in which he delighted. Before the expulsion of the Medici he fled to Bologna, where he was soon engaged upon the Arca di San Domineo begun by Niccolo Pisano in 1265, to which he added the well-known kneeling angel of Bologna. He was probably much influenced by the reliefs of Della Quercia about the door of San Petronio of these he afterward imitated in the Sistine Chapel. In 1495 he returned to Florence, when he is supposed to have made the San Giovannino in the Berlin Museum. From 1496 to 1501 he lived in Rome. To this period are attributed the Bacchus of the Bargello and the Cupid of the South Kensington Museum. The most important work of this time is the Pietà di San Pietro (1498). In 1501 he returned to Florence, and began the great David of the Signoria, made from a block of marble abandoned by Agostino di Duccio, which was placed in position May 18, 1504. The two colossal figures of Apollo and David in Buonarrotian House and the Bargello were probably made then, and also the picture of the Holy Family in the Uffizi. In 1503 there were commissioned from him the two figures for the sala Grande of the Palazzo Vecchio. The commission for one was given to Leonardo da Vinci, that for the other to Michelangelo in 1504. For it he prepared the great cartoon of the Battle of Cascina, an incident in the war with Pisa when, July 28, 1364, a band of 400 Florentines were attacked while bathing by Sir John Hawkwood's English troops. The cartoon contained 28 square feet of surface, and was crowded with nude figures in every position. It had, probably, more influence upon the art of the Renaissance than any single work. To about this time may be attributed the beginning of his poetic creations, of the multitude of which undoubtedly written a few only have come down to us. In Nov., 1505, he was called to Rome by Pope Julius II. to design his mausoleum, the history of which runs through the entire life of the master. Repeated designs and repeated attempts to carry them out were made, but he was frustrated by the successors of the great Pope. The matter finally ended in the reign of Paul III. by the placing in San Pietro in Vincolo of the statue of Moses, executed by Angelo, and finished by Raffaello di Montelupo and others. The Two Captives of the Louvre are part of the work as originally designed. In the spring of 1506 he assisted in the discovery of the Laocoon in the palace of Titus. His favorite antique was the Belvedere Torso, supposed to be a copy of the Heracles Epitrapezios of Lysippus. In April, 1506, probably as a result of the intrigues of Bramante, he was forced to abandon Rome for Florence. In the autumn he joined the Pope at Bologna, and made (1506–7) the bronze statue of Julius which stood over the door of San Petronio and was destroyed in 1511. The ceiling of the Sistine Chapel was begun early in 1508, and finished in Oct., 1512. Julius II. died Feb. 21, 1513, and was succeeded by Cardinal Giovanni de' Medici, son of the great Lorenzo, as Leo X. Michelangelo was diverted from the tomb of Julius by Leo, and employed from 1517 to 1520 in an abortive attempt to build the façade of San Lorenzo in Florence, and in developing the quarries of Carrara and Seravezza. In 1520 he began, by order of Cardinal Giulio de' Medici, the sacristy of San Lorenzo and the tombs of Giuliano and Lorenzo de' Medici with the famous reclining figures on the sarcophagi, perhaps the most thoroughly characteristic of all his works. Leo X. was succeeded by Adrian VI. in 1521, and he in turn by Giulio de' Medici as Clement VII., Sept. 23, 1523. On April 6, 1529, Michelangelo was appointed "governor and procurator-general over the construction and fortification of the city walls" in Florence. On Sept. 21, 1527 occurred his unexplained flight to Venice. He returned Nov. 29 of the same year, and was engaged in the defense of the city until the capitulation, Aug. 12, 1530. Before the end of the year 1534 he left Florence, never to return. The statues of the sacristy, including the Madonna and Child, were completed after his departure. Alessandro Farnese succeeded Clement VII. as Paul III., Oct., 1534. The last Judgment was begun about sept. 1, 1535, and finished before 1 Nov. 1541. Michelangelo's friendship for Vittoria Colonna began about 1538. (see Colonna, Vittoria.) The frescos of the Pauline Chapel were painted between 1542 and 1549. They represent the conversion of St. Paul and the martyrdom of St. Peter. He succeeded Antonio da Sangallo in 1546 in the offices which he held, and became architect of St. Peter's, Jan. 1, 1547. From this time until his death he worked on the church without compensation. The dome alone was completed with any regard to his plans.

Michelet, (mēsh-le'), Jules, Born at Paris, Aug. 21, 1798; died at Hyères, southern France, Feb. 9, 1874. An eminent French historian. He began his literary studies under the guidance of an old bookseller, and in his spare moments helped his father, a printer by trade, in setting type. He was first through College Charlemagne, and entered them on a higher course of study. In 1821 he graduated with the highest university honors, and was called at once to the chair of history in the College Rollin (1824-26). His first works were a "Tableau chronologique de l'histoire moderne" (1825), "Tableau synchronique de l'histoire moderne" (1826), and "Precis de l'histoire moderne" (1827). He was appointed lecturer at the Ecole Normale in 1827, and published his "Introduction a l'histoire universelle" (1831), "Morceaux choisis de Vico" (1835), "Origines du droit français" (1837), and "Histoire romaine: la république" (1839). Michelet began his famous course of lectures at the College de France in 1838, and in that connection "Des Jesuites" (1843), "Du prêtre, de la femme et de la famille" (1844), and "Du peuple" (1845). The clergy succeeded at last in silencing him, and he retired to Autheuil. The publication of his "Histoire de France" in sixteen volumes (1835-67) was interrupted by his "Histoire de la révolution française" (1847-53). "Le peuple" (1846), "Légendes démocratiques du nord" (1854). Michelet was married twice. He wrote, further, "Les femmes de la révolution" (1854), "L'oiseau" (1856), "L'insecte" (1858), "L'amour" (1859), "La femme" (1860), "La mer" (1861), "La bible de l'humanité" (1864). Michelet made a last return to history in attempting to bring his great work down to date. Death arrested the effort before he had finished but few volumes of his "Histoire du XIXe siecle" (1872-1873).

Michelet (mēsh-le-lā'), Karl Ludwig. Born at Berlin, Dec. 1, 1801; died at Berlin, Dec. 16, 1893. A German philosophical (Hegelian) writer, appointed professor of philosophy at Berlin in 1829. He wrote works on Aristotle, "Geschichte der letzten Systeme der Philosophie in Deutschland" (1837-38), "Entwickelungsgeschichte der neuesten deutschen Philosophie" (1843), "Das Persönlichkeit-Problem" (1843), "Die Epiphanie der ewigen Persönlichkeit des Geistes" (1841-52), "Geschichte der Menschheit" (1859-60), "System der Philosophie" (1876-82), etc.

Michelis (mē-chā'lis), Friedrich. Born at Münster, Prussia, July 27, 1815; died at Freiburg, Baden, May 28, 1886. A noted German theologian and philosopher, one of the leaders of the Old Catholic movement.

Michelozzo (mē-kā-lot'sō), or Michelozzi (mē-kā-lot'sē), Bartolommeo di Gherardo di. Born at Florence, 1396; died 1472. An eminent sculptor, engraver of gems, and architect. While associated with Donatello in making the monuments of Pope John XXIII., Cardinal Brancacci, and Bartolommeo Aragazzi, he was employed by Cosmo de' Medici to design and build the Medici Palace — now called the Riccardi Palace, as it was enlarged by the Marchese Riccardi in the 17th century. Recreated distinctly Florentine types which was subsequently followed in the Strozzi and other Florentine palaces. During his exile (1433-34) with Cosmo de' Medici in Venice, he built the library of San Giorgio Maggiore, adjoining the Convent of San Marco, which Cosmo endowed with many precious manuscripts and books. In Milan he built the great doorway of the Medici Palace and the Church of St. Peter Martyr. After his return to Florence Michelozzo displayed great skill in restoring the lower part of the Palazzo Vecchio, which had been dangerously weakened by the weight of the upper stories. He also built the Villas Careggi, Cafaggiolo, and Mozzi, and enlarged and rebuilt the convent of San Marco. Among the few remaining examples of his skill as a sculptor are a silver statuette of St. John Baptist on the altar of the Opera del Duomo in Florence, and a small St. John over the door of the Cimosino opposite the Baptistery.

Michelstadt (me'chel-stät'), A town in the province of Starkenburg, Hesse, 21 miles southeast of Darmstadt: the capital of the Odenwald. Population (1890), 3,068.

Michigan (mich'i-gan). One of the western States of the United States of America, extending (exclusive of islands) from about lat. 41° 45′ to 47° 30′ N., and from long. 82° 25′ to 90° 30′ W. Capital, Lansing; chief city, Detroit. It consists of two peninsulas (separated by the Strait of Mackinac). The southern is bounded by Lakes Huron, St. Clair, and Erie and St. Clair and Detroit rivers on the east, Lake Michigan on the west, and Ohio and Indiana on the south; and the northern lies between Lake Superior on the north and Lake Huron and Michigan and the State of Wisconsin on the south. The surface in the south is generally level, in the north it is rugged. There is rich mineral wealth in the north. Michigan is the first State in the production of copper, salt, and lumber, the fourth in wool, and one of the first in iron and wheat. It produces also apples, one of the first in iron and wheat. It produces also apples, Indian corn, etc., and has important fisheries of lake-trout, whitefish, etc. It has 34 counties sends 2 senators and 12 representatives to Congress, and has 14 electoral votes. It was explored by the French in the 17th century, and first permanently settled by them at Sault Ste. Marie in 1668; was ceded to Great Britain in 1763; was the scene of Pontiac's war; was formally surrendered to the United States in 1796; formed part of the Northwest Territory, and later of Indiana Territory; and was constituted Michigan Territory in 1805. Detroit was taken by the British in 1812. Michigan was recovered by the United States in 1813, and was admitted to the Union in 1837. Its name is from that of the lake. Area, 58,915 square miles. Population (1890), 2,093,889.

Midas (mī'das). [Gr. Midas.] In Greek legend, a king of Phrygia, son of Gordius and Cybele. According to the common form of the myth, the god Dionysus, from gratitude for kindness which had been shown to his teacher Silenus by Midas, promised to grant whatever the latter might ask. Midas, accordingly, requested that whatever he touched might turn to gold; but when he found that even his food was not excepted, and that he was likely to starve, he prayed that the gift might be taken away, and on bathing in the Pactolus was restored to his natural condition. The sands of the river, however, were ever after full of gold. On his refusing to award the prize of a musical contest between Pan and Apollo to the latter, the god changed his ears into those of an ass. These, which he concealed under his cap, were discovered by his barber, who, afraid to mention the secret to any one, relieved himself by digging a hole in the ground, whispering into it "King Midas has ass's ears," and then covering it up.

Middelburg (mid'del-bōrg). The capital of the province of Zealand, Netherlands, situated on the island of Walcheren in lat. 51° 30′ N., long. 3° 37′ E. Middle Ages. A period of about a thousand years, between the close of what is technically considered ancient history and the first definite movements in Europe of the distinctively modern spirit of freedom and enterprise. Its beginning is synchronous with that of the dark ages, and it is variously reckoned as extending to the fall of Constantinople (1453), the invention of printing, the Renaissance, or the discovery of America in the 15th century, or to the Reformation, in the early part of the 16th.

For, in truth, through all that period which we call the Dark and Middle Ages, men's minds were possessed by the belief that all things were destined to a change. The beginning, that no chasm never to be recrossed lay between them and that ancient world to which they had not ceased to look back. We who are centuries removed can see that there had passed a great and wonderful change upon thought, and art, and literature, and politics, and society itself: a change whose best illustration is to be found in the process whereby the forms of the pagan basilica became the Romanesque cathedral, and from it, in turn, the endless varieties of Gothic. But so gradual was the change that each generation of men, looking over them as over a plain, a man feels that perpetual transformation by which his body is renewed from year to year; while the few who had learning enough to study antiquity through its contemporary records were possessed by the very spirit of criticism, and of that which we call historical feeling, from seeing how prodigious was the contrast between themselves and those whom they studied. There is nothing more modern than the critical spirit which dwells upon the difference between the minds of men in one age and in another; which endeavors to make each age its own interpreter, and judge what it did or produced by a relative standard.

Among the older Midrashim are Mechilta on a part of Exodus, Sifra on Leviticus, and Sifrie on Numbers and Deuteronomy, all of which belong to the period of the Mishnah (which see). The most popular of the Midrashim was that of Rabbah or Rabboth (magnum) on the Pentateuch and the so-called "Five Rolls"—i. e. the books of Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther—which was composed between the 6th and 12th centuries.

Midshipman Easy, Mr. See Mr. Midshipman Easy.

Midsummer Night's Dream, A. A comedy by Shakspere, acted in 1595. It is mentioned by Meres in his "Palladis Tamia," which was issued in 1598, and was entered on the "Stationers' Register" Oct. 8, 1600. Two editions were printed in that year—one by James Roberts, the other by Thomas Fisher. Roberts's copy was used for the folio reprint.

Chaucer's legend of "Thisbe of Babilon," and Golding's translation of the same story from Ovid, probably furnished the matter for the interlude. So much as relates to Bottom and his fellow-clowns is mostly cane fresh from nature as she had passed under the poet's eye. The linking of these clowns in with the ancient tragic tale of Pyramus and Thisbe, so as to form the latter within the region of modern farce, thus travestying the classic into the grotesque, is not less original than droll.

Hudson, Int. to Midsummer Night's Dream.

Mignet (mēn-yā'), François Auguste Marie. Born at Aix, southern France, May 8, 1796; died at Paris, March 24, 1884. One of the foremost French historians of the 19th century. In 1815 he studied law in his native town, and enjoyed there the companionship of a young fellow-student, M. Thiers, for whom he kept up a lifelong friendship. In 1820 Mignet and Thiers founded a newspaper, "Le National." Mignet was at heart a liberal, and was always ready to take up his pen in defense of his ideas. He appeared for the first time before the public in successful competition for a prize offered by the Académie des Inscriptions, with an essay entitled "De la localité des institutes de saint Louis, et de la législation de ce prince (1821). Thereupon he came to Paris, where he published his "Histoire de la révolution française de 1789 à 1814" (1824). "Negociations relatives à la succession d'Espagne sous Louis XIV." (1838–42). "Notices et mémoires historiques" (1843, and again 1854 and 1874). "Vie de Franklin (1848). "Histoire de Marie Stuart" (1851). "Charles Quint" (1854). "Eloges historiques" (1864–74, various). "Antécédents historiques" (1875–76). "Rivalité de François I. et de Charles-Quint" (1875), etc. As dramatist Mignet wrote "Antonio Perez et Philippe II." (1845 and 1846). He was received into the French Academy in 1836.

Mignon (mēn-yon'). In Goethe's "Wilhelm Meister's Lehrjahre," a mysterious Italian maiden, the daughter of an old harper. She loves Wilhelm, and dies in despair when she finds that her love is not returned.

Two tragic figures are added to these, wandering in a twilight of mystery over the earth—Mignon and the harper; they are daughter and father, unknown to each other, exiles from their native country, and united to Wilhelm Meister by ties of love and gratitude. None of Goethe's creations appeal more strongly to the depths of the human soul than these two characters, with their touching songs solemn echoes of old mysticism seem revived in these songs full of earthly misery and longing for heaven; the laments of the loving harper, bowed down by the loneliness, friendless child, who may not reveal her inmost soul because her lips are sealed by a vow, alternate with the tears of the guilty, God-forsaken, lonely, and unmoved old man.

Scherer, History of German Lit. (trans.), II. 183.

Mignon. An opera by Ambroise Thomas, first produced at Paris in 1866, and at London in 1870. The words, founded on "Wilhelm Meister," are by Carré and Barbier.

Milan (mi-lan' or mil'an). A province of Lombardy, Italy. Area, 1,223 square miles. Population (1891), 1,235,150.

Milan. A former duchy in Lombardy, northern Italy. (Gian Galeazzo Visconti was the first duke (1395) and the end of the Visconti line came in 1447. The duchy was ruled by the Sforza family 1450-1535 (succession being disputed with France 1499-1512); passed to Spain in 1535, and to Austria in 1713-14; was conquered by France in 1796; formed part of the Cisalpine Republic from 1797, of the Italian Republic from 1802, and of the kingdom of Italy from 1805; was ceded to Austria in 1814; and was annexed to Sardinia in 1859.

Milan, It. Milano (mē-lä'nō), G. Mailand (mīl'länd). The capital of the province of Milan, Italy, situated on the river Olona, in the Lombard plain, in lat. 45° 28′ N., long. 9° 11′ E.; the Roman Mediolanum. It is the second city in size in Italy, the chief city in Lombardy, and the principal commercial and financial center of the country. As the center of a rich agricultural district it exports dairy and other farm products. It has important manufactures of furniture, watches, silk, machinery, gloves, etc.; and is noted also as an educational, musical, and theatrical center. The cathedral, begun in its present form in 1387, is popularly celebrated for the profusion of its sculptured decoration and pinnacles, and the beauty of its material (white marble); but as an architectural whole it does not justify its reputation. Despite the beauty of such details as the flying buoyant tracery of the great windows of the apse, and the majestic effect of the interior. The central lantern and spire are graceful, but the other parts are not well proportioned, and the west front, with its semi-circular jumble of Pointed and classical forms, is barbarous, while the decoration is cold and without the vigorous life of good mediæval art. There are 52 aisles. The chief dimensions are: length, 480 feet; breadth, 252; transepts, 288; height of vaulting, 156; height of spire, 355. It is surpassed in size in Italy by St. Peter's only. The cathedral contains many beautiful tombs. The Ospedale Maggiore, founded by Francesco Sforza in 1456, is one of the most beautiful creations of Lombard brick architecture. In the refectory of rich Pointed arches inclosing double Pointed windows, the lower tier inclosed in a Corinthian arcade. Other objects of interest are the gallery Vittorio Emmanuele, Brera (with picture-gallery and library), Museum Poldi-Pezzoli, archæological and some other museums, Ambrosian library, Piazza de Mercanti, the churches of the Monastero Maggiore (of Santa Maria delle Grazie with the "Last Supper" of Leonardo da Vinci), of San Ambrogio, and of San Lorenzo, the Arco della Pace, and the Scala theater. The tradition is that Milan was founded by the Celtic king Bellovesus about 600 B. C. It was the capital of the Insubrian Gauls; was taken by the Romans 222 B. C.; and was one of the chief cities of the later Roman Empire, and an imperial residence. Ambrose was bishop of Milan 374-397. It was sacked by Attila in 452; was destroyed by the Goths in 539; belonged to Lombardy and later to the empire; was seized and destroyed by Frederick Barbarossa in 1162; was rebuilt by the Lombard League in 1167; was ruled by the Torre, Visconti, and Sforza families; and has been the capital of the Milanese, or duchy of Milan (which see), the Cisalpine Republic, the kingdom of Italy (first), and the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom. It was the scene of an insurrection against Austrian rule in 1848, and of outbreaks in 1849 and 1853. In 1859 it was united to the kingdom of Italy. It has been noted in art as the residence of Bramante, Leonardo da Vinci, etc. Population (1891), commune, 325,049.

Miles (mīlz). A character in Greene's play "Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay."

A very diverting comic character is Bacon's servant Miles, who is of the type of the Vice in the moralities. He plays the fool, diversified by either living monsters or supernatural phenomena, and in the end cheerfully consents to be carried off by a devil, on being given to understand that in Hell tobacco is to be had in plenty, as well as find a lusty fire, a pot of good ale, a "pair" of cards, and other requisites for a comfortable life. Ward

Miles, Nelson Appleton. Born at Westminster, Mass., Aug. 8, 1839. An American general. He served as a volunteer in the Army of the Potomac, 1861-63; was in the Army of the Tennessee, 1863-64; and was promoted major-general in 1890. He conducted several campaigns against hostile Indians on the western frontiers, notably that against the Apaches under Geronimo and Natchez, both of whom surrendered Sept. 4, 1886.

Miletus (mī-lē'tus). [Gr. Μίλητος.] In the inhabitants of Miletus.—2. The natives of Ireland: members of the Irish race. They have been so called from the tradition of an ancient conquest and reorganization of the country by two sons of Milesius, a fabulous king of Spain. It is supposed that the legendary race of Milesians was the same as the Scots who conquered Ireland in prehistoric times.

Miles, Phineas (mīlz). Short stories of a witty and obscene nature, greatly in vogue among the Greeks and Romans. The name has arisen from a collection of tales by Antonius Diogenes, compiled by Aristides of Miletus; they were translated into Latin by Cornelius Sisenna (117-67 B. C.). These tales are now lost, but the name is still given to stories of a like nature. Bulwer published in 1869 a volume of poems entitled "Miles Phineas Miletus."

Miles Wallingford. A novel by Cooper, published in 1844.

Mileto (mē-lä'tō). A town in Calabria, Italy, 43 miles northeast of Reggio.

Miletus (mī-lē'tus). [Gr. Μίλητος.] In ancient geography, a city situated in Caria, Asia Minor, on the Latmic Gulf, opposite the mouth of the Mæander, about lat. 37° 30′ N., long. 27° 10′ E. The temple of Apollo Didymæus here was restored in its final form about the time of Alexander. The ancients considered it one of the most splendid four existing. It was an Ionic dipteros of 10 by 21 columns, on a hyblobate of 3 steps, measuring 160 by 350 feet. The columns were over 6 feet in base diameter, and 64 high. The cella, in plan 67 by 160 feet, had deep pronaos with 4 columns in antis, and 2 subordinate interior chambers. The main chamber was divided into 3 aisles by ranges of columns. Remains exist of an ancient theater, entirely built of masonry, and enormous in mass: there is much sculptured ornament, including rich Composite capitals with Victories amid the foliage. It was early colonized by Ionian Greeks; was one of the leading Greek cities, a colonizer, and a center of philosophy and literature: headed the Ionian revolt against Persia in 500 B. C.; and was stormed and sacked by the Persians 494 B. C., and by a village (Palatia).

Mill, John Stuart. Born at London, May 20, 1806: died at Avignon, France, May 8, 1873. A celebrated English philosophical writer, logician, and economist: eldest son of James Mill. He was a precocious child, and was put through an extraordinary system of forcing by his father, the took entire charge of his education. He was brought up agnostic from his infancy, and never acquired any religious beliefs. In 1819 he visited France with his father, entered the India House as his father's assistant. He became chief examiner in 1856. His first important literary work was the editing of Bentham's "Rentcue upon Rent" (1863). His "Essays on Unsettled Questions of Political Economy" were written about 1830 (published 1844). In 1836 the "London Review," established in 1835, was amalgamated with the "Westminster Review," and Mill became practically its superintendent: he was its proprietor 1837-40. In 1836 he passed through a severe mental crisis, probably as a result of his extraordinary training, and was led to modify the strict utilitarianism of his father's school. His intimacy with Mrs. Taylor (whom he married in 1851) began in 1830. Mill's "Logic," his first successful work, was published in 1843. His "Political Economy" was published in 1848. His most carefully written work, the "Essay on Liberty," was published in 1859. He was elected member of Parliament for Westminster in 1865. His book "On the Subjection of Women" was published in 1869; his "Autobiography" appeared in 1873. Among his other publications are "Thoughts on Parliamentary Reform" (1859), "Dissertations and Discussions" (1859-67), "Considerations on Representative Government" (1861), "Utilitarianism" (1863), "Examination of Sir William Hamilton's Philosophy, etc." (1865), "Auguste Comte and Positivism"

Miller, William. Born at Wingham, Kent, Dec. 2, 1796: died at Calloo, Peru, Oct. 31, 1861. An English general in the service of Peru. He fought with the British in the Peninsula 1811–14, and in the United States in 1815; took service with the patriots at Buenos Ayres in 1817, and distinguished himself in the invasion of Chile 1817–19, and in Peru, where he held independent commands and led the cavalry at Junin (Aug. 6, 1824) and Ayacucho (Dec. 9, 1824). He remained in the service of Peru, became grand marshal under Santa Cruz, and on his defeat (1839) was banished. He returned and was reinstated in rank in 1839. His "Memoirs" were published in 1828 by his brother, John Miller; they give one of the best accounts of the Spanish-American revolution.

Miller, William. Born at Edinburgh, May 28, 1796: died at Sheffield, England, Jan. 20, 1882. A Scottish line-engraver. He was apprenticed in 1811 to William Bromley, Junior, and in 1818 studied with George Cook in London. He returned to Edinburgh, and his first plates were for Williams's "Views in Greece" (1822). In 1824 he began to engrave after Turner, of whom he was the chief interpreter.

Miller, William Allen. Born at Ipswich, Dec. 17, 1817: died at Liverpool, Sept. 30, 1870. An English chemist. He was educated at Merchant Taylors' School and at a Quaker seminary at Ackworth in Yorkshire. About 1840 he entered the medical department of King's College, London, and in 1840 studied with Liebig at Giessen. In 1842 he received the degree of M. D. from the University of London, and in 1845 he was made an F. R. S. His first experiments in spectrum analysis were published in a paper before the British Association in 1845, in which diagrams of the spectra were first shown. In 1862 this was followed by a paper on the "Photographic Transparency of Various Bodies," illustrated by photographs of the spectra of twenty-five metals. With the assistance of Dr. Huggins he began in 1862 experiments on the spectra of the heavenly bodies, procuring the first trustworthy results in solar chemistry. They were awarded the gold medal of the Royal Astronomical Society for their results. In 1851 he published a "Report on the Metropolitan Water Supply." He invented a self-registering thermometer for deep-sea soundings.

Miller's Tale of the Carpenter, The. One of Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales." Its source is unknown, but it is probably from some rough jest of the day.

Millesimo (mil-lā'sē-mō). A village in the province of Genoa, Italy, situated on the Bormida 36 miles west of Genoa. Here, April 13 and 14, 1796, the French under Bonaparte defeated the Austrian and Sardinian forces.

Millet (mē-yā'). Aimé. Born at Paris, Sept. 27, 1819: died there, Jan. 13, 1891. A French sculptor. He studied both painting and sculpture, and was for a time in the studio of David d'Angers. He first exhibited paintings at the Salon of 1842, and until 1852 his exhibits were both paintings and statues. After that he confined himself entirely to sculpture. Among his works are "Une Anachorète" (1845); "Arlaine" (1857), now at the Luxembourg; "Vercingétorix," a colossal statue in copper set up at Alise-Sainte Reine, Côte-d'Or (1865); a number of portrait busts, including George Sand and Edmond About; "Tombeau de la Princesse Christine de Montpensier," for the city of Seville (1881). "La Physique," for the Nice Observatory (1881); various colossal figures for public buildings in Paris (1882); a bronze statue of Edgar Quinet (1885). "Phidias," for the Luxembourg Gardens (1887); etc.

Millet (mil'let). Francis Davis. Born at Mattapoisett, Mass., Nov. 3, 1846. An American figure- and portrait-painter. He studied at Antwerp at the Royal Academy with Van Lerius and De Keyser. He was correspondent for the London "Daily News" in the war between Russia and Turkey. Among his works are "Bay of Naples" (1875), "Abdel Kader" (1880), "Uhlan Scat" (1885), "The Handmaid" and "A Cosy Corner" (1886), "How the Gossip Grew" (1890).

Millet (mē-yā'), François (Frans Mille), often called Francisque. Born at Antwerp, 1642: died at Paris, 1679. A Flemish landscape-painter, a pupil of Laurens Francken, and afterward a follower of Poussin.

Millet, Jean François. Born at Gruchy, near Gréville, Manche, France, Oct. 4, 1814: died at Barbizon, near Fontainebleau, France, Jan. 20, 1875. A celebrated French painter, noted for his simple and pathetic representations of peasant life in France. He worked with his father, a farmer, as a farm-laborer in his youth, and in 1832, having shown ability in drawing, he was placed at Cherbourg with Mouchel, who secured for him an annuity to enable him to proceed with his studies. He went to Paris in 1837, and studied with Paul Delaroche; and in 1840 his first work, a portrait, was accepted at the Salon. He struggled to maintain himself for some years, and in 1845 sent out the landscapes in Paris. The next year he settled at Barbizon, where he remained for the rest of his life. Among his works are "The Sower" (1850), "Peasants Grafting" (1855), "The Gleaners" (1857), "The Angelus" (1859), "The Shepherdess" (1863), "Death and the Woodcutter" (1859), "Waiting" and "The Sheep-shearers" (1860), "The Man with the Hoe" and "Wool-Carding" (1863), "Shepherdess and Sheep" (1864), "Goose Girl" (1867), "Evening Prayer" (1868), "Potato Planters" (1868), etc.

Millevoye (mēl-vwä'), Charles Hubert. Born at Abbeville, 1782: died at Paris, 1816. A French poet. He published a volume of poems in 1801. His article on "Le danger des romans" (1804) and a series of his poems (1806-12) were crowned by the Academy.

At the head of the poets of this minor band has to be mentioned Millevoye, who might, perhaps with equal or greater appropriateness, have been found a place in the preceding book. He is chiefly remarkable as the author of one charming piece of sentimental verse, "La Chute des Feuilles"; and as the occasion of an immortal criticism of Sainte-Beuve's, "Il se trouve dans les trois quarts des hommes un poète qui meurt jeune tandis que l'homme survit." Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 541.

Milliken's Bend (mil'i-kenz bend). A village in Madison parish, Louisiana, situated on the Mississippi 17 miles northwest of Vicksburg. A body of 3,000 Confederates was repulsed here by the Federals June 7, 1863.

Milton (mil'ton). John. Born about 1563; died in March, 1647. The father of John Milton the poet, and son of Richard Milton of Stanton St. John, near Oxford. He was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, where he became a Protestant. He was admitted to the Company of Scriveners in London Feb. 27, 1600. He married Sarah, daughter of Paul Jeffrey, a merchant tailor. He was a man of high character, a good scholar, and devoted to music.

Milton, John. Born at London, Dec. 9, 1608; died there, Nov. 8, 1674. A celebrated English poet. He was the son of John Milton, a scrivener. His tutor was Thomas Young, graduate of St. Andrews University, afterward well known as a Presbyterian clergyman and master of Jesus College, Cambridge. He also attended St. Paul's School until 1624. At 16 he entered Christ's College, Cambridge, in the grade of pensioner, and graduated in 1629. To this period he long most of his Latin poems, the "Ode on the Nativity" (1629), the Latin Elegies (1626-28), and the sonnet to the nightingale, etc. For the next six years he devoted himself to literature at Horton, near Windsor, where his wife "Mr. Powell of Forest Hill, Oxfordshire. She was the daughter of a Royalist, and was only 17 years old; she found herself ill matched with an abandoned Puritan and left him. This desertion was the occasion of his pamphlets on divorce, and the persecution which followed suggested the "Areopagitica," a plea for a free press (the only poem of his long prose works). She returned to him after a few years, and he forgave her. She died in 1652. Of this marriage three children, daughters, lived to maturity. After the execution of Charles I. Milton was made Latin secretary to the new Commonwealth (March, 1649). Of his political writings during this period the most important are the "Eikonoklastes" in answer to the "Eikon Basilike" of John Gauden, and the famous "Defensio prima" or "Pro Populo Anglicano Defensio" (1650), an answer to the "Defensio Regia pro Carolo I." by Claude de Saumaise of Leyden. The "Defensio secunda" appeared in May, 1654. By May, 1652, he had become totally blind. In 1656 he married Catharine Woodcock, who died in 1658; and in 1663 he married Elizabeth Minshull, his third wife and last. Up to the period of his third marriage his domestic life had been rendered unhappy by the multitudinous of his daughters, who were neglected of the demands and employments his blindness imposed upon them. At the Restoration he was freed from all legal consequences of his actions as the Latin secretary (Oct., 1660). "Paradise Lost" was actually begun in the epic form in 1658, finished before July, 1665, and published in 1667. He sold his rights in the poem to Samuel Simmons, printer, for £5 down, and three successive payments of £5 each. In 1669 he published "The Accidence commenced Grammar." In 1671 "Paradise Regained" and "Samson Agonistes." His numerous other works in Latin and English were mostly polemical. His "History of Britain" to the Norman Conquest, and his "Treatise on Education, etc.," was published in 1673.

Minerva (mi-nėr'vä). In Roman mythology, one of the three chief divinities, the other two being Jupiter and Juno. The chief seat of the cult of all three was the great temple on the Capitoline Hill. Minerva was a virgin, the daughter of Jupiter, the supreme god, and hence was identified, as the Romans came more and more under the influence of Hellenic culture, with the Greek Athene (or Athena) or Pallas, the goddess of wisdom, of war, and of the liberal arts. Like Athene, Minerva was represented in art with a grave and majestic countenance, armed with helmet, shield, and spear, and wearing long full drapery, and on her breast the ægis.

Minerva. An antique statue in marble, in the Glyptothek at Munich. The goddess wears the sealed ægis, with Gorgon and helmet. The helmeted head, though antique, does not belong to this statue, and the right arm is incorrectly restored as raised to hold a spear: it was probably extended, supporting a Victory.

Minerva Medica. [So called from the contorted serpent at the goddess's feet.] An impressive antique statue in Parian marble, in the Vatican, Rome. It is a copy from a fine Greek original, and is believed to have been the cult-statue of the temple replaced by Santa Maria sopra Minerva. The goddess stands erect as guardian, holding her spear. She is clad in a long diploidion-tunic, with the ægis and himation, and wears a Corinthian helmet.

Minerva Pacifera. ['The peace-bringer.'] A fine statue found at Velletri, now in the Capitoline Museum, Rome. The goddess holds her spear, and wears diploidion and himation and Corinthian helmet, but no ægis, and is attended by no serpent. The type is closely similar to that of the Minerva Medica.

Minuchihr (mod. Pers. pron. mi-nō'cheh'r). ['Heavenly-faced.'] In the Shahnamah, an Iranian king, the son of Iraj and father of Naudar. For his life before his accession to the throne of his great-grandfather Faridun, see Faridun. Before his death Faridun intrusted the care of Minuchihr to his trusty warrior Sam, the son of Nariman. The story of Minuchihr's reign is essentially that of the heroic adventures of Zal, the son of Sam, including the birth of Zal's son Rustam, and his first two adventures, the slaying of the white elephant and the fight of Sipand. See Zal.

Minucius Felix (mi-nū'shi-us fē'liks), Marcus. A Roman advocate and Christian apologist, probably a contemporary of Marcus Aurelius. His dialogue "Octavius" is the earliest extant work of Latin Christian literature. The scene of the conversation is laid at Ostia, and the speakers are Cæcilius Natalis, Octavius Januarius, and the author. Cæcilius attacks Christianity on various grounds, and Octavius defends it; at the conclusion Cæcilius declares himself won to the argument, and the author, who acts as umpire, declares that a decision is unnecessary.

Minuit (min'ū-it), or Minnewit (min'e-wit), Peter. Born at Wesel, Rhenish Prussia, about 1580: died at Fort Christina, New Sweden (Delaware), 1641. A colonial official in the Dutch and afterward in the Swedish service in America. He was appointed governor of New Netherlands by the Dutch West India Company for 1626, and landed on Manhattan Island May 4, 1626. He purchased the island from the Indians for trinkets valued at about twenty-four dollars, and erected Fort Amsterdam. He was recalled in Aug., 1631. Having been commissioned by the Swedish West India Company to found a colony on the west side of Delaware Bay, he left Gothenburg with a band of fifty colonists in 1637, and, after losing a shipload of them down, reached Delaware Bay in April, 1638. He purchased from the Indians the region between Cape Henlopen and the falls of the Delaware at Trenton, to which was given the name of New Sweden, and erected Fort Christina. He remained governor of New Sweden until his death.

Miraboe (mē-rä-bō'), Vicomte de (André Boniface Louis Riquetti). Born at Bignon, near Nemours, France, 1754; died at Freiburg, Baden, 1792. A French royalist deputy to the National Assembly, brother of Gabriel Honoré de Mirabeau.

Mirabeau, Comte de (Gabriel Honoré Riquetti). Born at the Château de Bignon, Loiret, France, March 9, 1749; died at Paris, April 2, 1791. The greatest orator of the French Revolution. As a child he was so unruly that his father treated him with great severity, and ended by putting him through a course of military training. He entered the army, served in Corsica, and rose to the rank of captain of dragoons. He married in 1772, and had soon spent the better part of his wife's fortune. Various intrigues, especially his elopement with Sophie de Ruffey, the young wife of the Marquis de Monnier, led to his detention at different times; he obtained final release in Dec., 1780. Up to that time he had written essays and pamphlets, translated English and German books, and kept up a correspondence with Sophie de Ruffey, to whom he had dedicated his "Erotica biblion" and other works. After traveling in Switzerland, he went to London (1784–5), and then to Berlin (1786–87). From here he wrote home a series of official reports, "Histoire secrète de la cour de Berlin (1787), and the clever, facetious pamphlet "Denkschrift" ("Monarchic prussienne" (1788). Mirabeau was elected a delegate of the third estate from Aix to the convention of the States-General in Paris (1789), and his ability as an orator at once made him a political power. In 1790 he became president of the Jacobin Club, also (1791) of the National Assembly. His course of life undermined his robust constitution, and he died in his forty-third year.

Mirabeau, Marquis de (Victor Riquetti). Born in Provence, France, Oct. 5, 1715; died at Argenteuil, France, July 13, 1789. A French political economist, father of Gabriel Honoré de Mirabeau: called "The Friend of Man" ("L'ami des hommes"), from the title of one of his works.

Mirabeau-Tonneau (-to-nō'). [F., 'Mirabeau the barrel.'] André Boniface Louis Riquetti, Vicomte de Mirabeau: so nicknamed on account of his size.

Mirabel, or Mirabell (mir'a-bel). 1. The principal character in Fletcher's play "The Wild Goose Chase." He is a libertine and fashionable rake, gaining his title of "wild goose" from his successful evasion of the marriage noose.

2. In Congreve's comedy "The Way of the World," a brilliant and witty fine gentleman, said to be like Congreve himself.

Mirabel, Old. In Farquhar's comedy "The Inconstant," a peevish old man with a fondness for his son.

Mirabel, Tommy. The son of Old Mirabel: "the inconstant," in Farquhar's play of that name. He is a gay and generous fine gentleman, but unstable in his affections. The first four acts of this play are taken from "The Wild Goose Chase"; and, though somewhat modified, the characters are the same. All these parts have been general favorites both with actors and with audiences.

Mirabella (mir-a-bel'lä). A fair maiden, in Spenser's "Faerie Queene," who had scorned many lovers. She was sentenced in Cupid's court to ride on a wretched jade, "accompanied by a fool, till she had saved as many lovers as she had slain."

Mirach, or Mirak (mī'rak or mē'rak). [Ar. mirāḳ, the loins: but the derivation is doubtful.] The ordinary name of the second-magnitude star β Andromedæ. The name is also applied to the third-magnitude star ι Bootis, which is more usually known as Izar (which see).

Mirambo (mē-räm'bō). Died 1885. A chief of the Wanyamwezi, East Africa, who from the rank of a common porter rose to that of a powerful chief and conqueror.

Miramichi (mir'a-mi-shē'). 1. A bay forming an arm of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, situated east of New Brunswick.—2. A river in New Brunswick which falls into Miramichi Bay. Length, about 175 miles.

Miramion (mē-rä-myōṅ'), Madame de (Marie Bonneau). Born at Paris, 1629; died there, 1696. A French woman noted for her good works. After an unhappy youth she founded the House of Refuge, the establishment of Ste.-Pélagie, and the original community of 12 girls which became later the Congregation des Miramions. Of this she became the superior, and left her great fortune to this and other benevolent institutions.

Miramon (mē-rä-mōn'), Miguel. Born at Mexico City, Sept. 29, 1832; died at Querétaro, June 19, 1867. A Mexican general. He was prominent on the side of the reactionists 1856–58; succeeded Zuloaga as president of that faction Feb. 2, 1859; and during the succeeding two years of the "reform" war spent much of the time in the field against Juarez and his adherents. He was eventually defeated at the battle of Colpulapan, near Mexico, Dec. 22, 1860, and fled from the country. Maximilian, whom he adhered, made him grand marshal and minister to Berlin. He returned to Mexico in 1866, became one of Maximilian's most trusted generals, and fell with him, shot with Miramon at Querétaro.

Miranda (mi-ran'dä). [L., 'admirable.'] 1. In Shakspere's play "The Tempest," the daughter of Prospero: she is loved by Ferdinand.

> The character of Miranda resolves itself into the very elements of womanhood. She is beautiful, modest, and tender, and she is these only; they comprise her whole being, external and internal. She is so perfectly unsophisticated, so delicately refined, that she is all but ethereal.
> Mrs. Jameson, Characteristics of Women.

2. In Mrs. Centlivre's comedy "The Busybody," an heiress. Mrs. Abingdon made her début in this character in 1755.

Miranda (mē-rän'dä). A northern state of Venezuela, between Barmudez and Carabobo, and extending from the Caribbean Sea to the Orinoco. Capital, Ciudad de Cura. It inclosses the Federal District and Caracas. The southern part lies in the llanos and is a grazing country; the northern section is mountainous and agricultural. Miranda corresponds nearly to the extinct state of Guzman Blanco. Area, 33,963 square miles. Population (1889), 526,633.

Miranda (mē-rän'dä), Francisco Antonio Gabriel. Born at Caracas, Venezuela, June 9, 1756: died at Cadiz, Spain, July 14, 1816. A Spanish-American revolutionist. He was an officer in the Spanish army 1775–82, and subsequently served with the French allies of the North Americans; was in St. Petersburg, where he received a pension from Catharine II.; fought in the French republican army as general of division 1796–93; and in the latter year was accused before the Revolutionary tribunal, but escaped. He spent many years in scheming for the emancipation of Spanish South America, and made an unsuccessful descent on the coast of Venezuela in 1806, with the design of leading a revolt. After the revolution of 1810 he returned to Venezuela, was made commander of the patriot army, and in April, 1812, was made dictator. The great earthquake of March 26, 1812, left the country impoverished, and was regarded by many as a sign of divine wrath: as a consequence the royalists gained ground, and on July 25 Miranda signed a treaty which gave up the country to them. He was arrested soon after, sent to Spain, and died in captivity. Miranda's influence on the Spanish-American revolution was very great, but mainly indirect, through the secret societies which he established, and through his influence with European statesmen. See Great Reunion Americana.

Miranda, Saa de. Born at Coimbra in 1495; died in 1579. A Portuguese poet. He wrote, in the Italian style, pastorals, comedies, sonnets, and lyrics, chiefly in Castilian.

Mirandola (mē-rän'dō-lä). A small town in the province of Modena, Italy, 18 miles north-northeast of Modena.

Mirandola, Count of. See Pico.

Mirror for Magistrates, The. A compilation of poems undertaken by William Baldwin with aid from George Ferrers and others. It was begun and partly printed in 1555, but was stopped by the lord chancellor, Stephen Gardiner, to whom it was licensed and first issued. It then contained 19 metrical tragedies, or biographies, of men in high place who had come to violent ends, and was an English sequel to Lydgate's "Falls of Princes" from Boccaccio. It has been justly said to connect the work of Lydgate with that of Spenser. It was republished in 1563, 1574, 1578, and 1587, each time with additions. The "Induction" and "Complaint of Buckingham," which were contributed by Thomas Sackville, Lord Buckhurst, to the edition of 1559, not published till 1563, outweigh all the rest in value.

Aldee published in October, 1579, what [Anthony] Munday may well have regarded as his first piece of substantial work, a religious companion to "The Mirror for Magistrates," called "The Mirrour of Mutabilitie; or, principal part of the Mirrour of Magistrates, selected out of the sacred scriptures." Mirrors were in fashion. There was a "Theatre or Mirror of the World," in 1569; a "Mirror of Madness," in 1656; a "Mirror of Modestie" [by Thomas Colter] had been licensed to Edward White in April, 1579; there was afterwards a "Mirror of Mirth," in 1583; a "Mirror of Modestie" was published by Robert Greene, [1584]; a "Mirror of Man's Miseries," in 1584; a "Mirror of Mutanimity," in 1599; a "Mirror of Martyrs," in 1601; with more of the kind. Mathematics, Politics, and the Latin Tongue were shown also in "Mirrors." "The Mirrour of Mutabilitie" was a series of metrical tragedies in two parts.
Morley, English Writers, IX. 155.

Mirror of Knighthood, The. A translation of the Spanish romance "Cavallero del Febo of Phebo" ("the Knight of the Sun"), containing the adventures of the Donzel del Phebo, the fair Lindabrides, etc. It belongs to the Amadis cycle of romances.

The whole romance ["Knight of the Sun"] has been translated into English, under the title of the Mirrour of Knighthood, and into French literally from the Spanish, in eight volumes.
Dunlop, Hist. of Prose Fiction, I. 377.

Mirror of Modesty, The. A pamphlet by Robert Greene, published in 1584. It tells the story of Susanna and the elders.

Mirror of the World, The. See the extract.

There was also, upon a hundred leaves of folio, "The Mirrour of the World," translated and printed in the year 1481, with wood-engravings. It was a book translated from a Latin "Imago Mundi" vel Imago Mundi" in 1245, for the Duke of Berry, into French verse, which was afterwards turned by a Maistre Gossouin — unless that be only the name of a copyist — into French prose. From that prose Caxton made his translation in 1481 at the request of Hugh Brice, of the Mercers' company, citizen and alderman of London, and, like Caxton, a kentish man, who wished for the book as a present to Lord Hastings.
Morley, English Writers, VI. 314.

Mirza. See Vision of Mirza.

Mirzam (mėr-zăm'). [Ar. al-mirzam, the roarer.] The third-magnitude star β Canis Majoris, in the paw of the animal. The Arabs gave the same name to three other stars: β Canis Minoris and α and γ Orionis.

Mirzapur (mėr-zä-pör'). 1. A district in the Northwest Provinces, British India, intersected by lat. 25° N., long. 82° 40' E. Area, 5,224 square miles. Population (1881), 1,136,796.— 2. The capital of the district of Mirzapur, situated on the Ganges 31 miles west-southwest of Benares. It was long noted for its cotton fracle. Population (1881), 84,150.

Mirza-Schaffy (mėr'zä-shäf'fė). An Oriental poet who was the teacher and friend of Friedrich Bodenstedt during his residence in Tiflis. The "Songs of Mirza-Schaffy," published by Bodenstedt in 1851, are (with one or two exceptions) his own, but are Oriental in spirit and imagery. They became, and still are, extraordinarily popular. See Bodenstedt.

Misanthrope, Le (lė mė-zän-tröp'). A comedy by Molière, produced in 1666. This play is an almost inexhaustible source of quotations, quotable commonplaces, and verbal sayings, etc. Its principal interest lies in the development of various pairs of opposing characters in even their lightest shades. It is the ideal of classic comedy.

Here Molière's special vein of satire was worked most deeply and to great profit, though the reproach that the handling is somewhat too serious for comedy is not undeserved. Alceste the impatient but not cynical hero, Célimene the coquette, Oronte the fop, Philinte the reasonable woman, Arsinoé the mischief-maker, are all immortal types.
Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 310.

Mischabelhörner (mė-shä-bel-hėr'ner). Spurs of Monte Rosa, in the Swiss Alps. They are the Dom (14,940 feet) and the Täschhorn (14,-747 feet).

Miser, The. 1. A comedy by Thomas Shadwell (1671), founded on Molière's "L'Avare." —2. A comedy by Fielding (1733), from the same source.

Misérables, Les (lā mė-zā-räbl'). [F., "The Unfortunates."] A novel by Victor Hugo, in five parts: "Fantine," "Cosette," "Marius," "L'Idylle rue Plumet," and "Jean Valjean." It was published in 1862.

Misfortunes of Arthur, The. A tragedy written principally by Thomas Hughes, produced in 1587 before Queen Elizabeth. Eight members of the Society of Gray's Inn cooperated with him, and the "triumphs" and dumb-show were devised principally by Bacon.

Mishnah (mish'nä). A collection of rabbinical discussions on the law of Moses, the object of which was to apply and adapt it to the varying circumstances of life and of the times, and to extend it by logical conclusions and analogies. The word Mishnah properly means 'repetition,' then 'instruction,' 'learning.' It was not at first allowable that these discourses should be reduced to writing; they had to be learned by heart, and are called the oral law as opposed to the written law of the Pentateuch. The beginning of the Mishnah goes back to the time of the Maccabees. It was delivered in the schools orally from generation to generation. At the end of the 2d century the patriarch Judah I. collected, arranged, and codified the accumulated material in its present shape. The numerous rules and decisions are arranged according to subject in 6 orders (sedarim): (1) seeds (zeraim), on agriculture; (2) festivals (moed), (3) women (nashim), on connubial affairs; (4) damages (nezikin), civil and criminal laws; (5) sacrifices (kodashim); (6) purifications (tohoroth). The orders are divided into 63 tracts, and these again into chapters. The explanations of or comments on the Mishnah are called gemara, and both together constitute the Talmud (which see).

Misiones, Pg. Missiones (mē-sē-ō'nes). A territory forming the extreme northeastern part of the Argentine Republic, between the Paraná and Uruguay rivers. An early seat of Jesuit missionary activity in Missions, is held by Brazil as state of Santa Catharina, but is claimed by the Argentine government. In 1801 the claim was submitted to the arbitration of the United States. Misiones, Misiones, Misiones, Misiones, the region called Guayra (which see), was occupied by flourishing Jesuit missions from 1633 to 1767; and is said to have had a population of 120,000. Area, 25,000 square miles. Present population (1892), 11,000; of Upper Missiones, 5,000.

Misisaga (mis-ē-si'gą). A tribe of North American Indians, once a part of the Ojibwa, first heard of in the latter part of the 17th century north of Lake Huron and on Manoulin Island. After the flight of the Huron and Ottawa they spread over southern Ontario. In 1746 they were admitted as the seventh tribe of the Iroquois Confederacy. Their name is from misi, great mouth, referring to the mouth of Mississagh River emptying into Lake Huron. Their present (1893) number in Ontario is 574. See Algonquian.

Misogonus (mi-sog'ō-nus). A rimed play, presumably by Thomas Richards in 1560. It is therefore earlier than "Gammer Gurton's Needle" or "Ralph Roister Doister." (Ward.) It contains songs, and has some chances of meter.

Misol, or Mysol (mi-sol'). A small island northwest of Papua, situated in lat. 2° 4' S., long. 130° 10' E.

Mispah. See Mizpah.

Miss Betsy Thoughtless. A novel by Mrs. Haywood, published in 1751.

"Miss Betsy Thoughtless" is rather a clever work and interesting as the first really domestic novel, according to modern ideas, that exists in the language. It has been forgotten that Miss Burney took it as the model of her "Evelina," and it is the only novel I know which could have served for the purpose.
Forsyth, Novels and Novelists of the 18th Century, p. 204.

Miss in her Teens, or the Medley of Lovers. A comedy by David Garrick, produced in 1747 and long be as favorite.

Missinnipi (mis-i-nip'i). A name given in part of its course to the Churchill River.

Missionary Ridge (mish'on-ā-ri rij). A mountain on the border of Georgia and Tennessee, southeast of Chattanooga. It was the scene of the final struggle in the battle of Chattanooga, Nov. 25, 1863. The ridge was defended by the Confederates by a strongly intrenched position. The Federals attacked them in two divisions under Hooker and Sherman, and after a long hand-to-hand fight successfully put them to flight.

Missiones. See Misiones.

Mississippi (mis-i-sip'i). [Ind., 'the great river' or 'the father of waters.'] The largest river of North America. It rises in or near Lake Itasca, northern Minnesota, about lat. 47° 12' N., 1,575 feet above sea-level, traverses part of Minnesota: forms the boundary between Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, Arkansas, and Louisiana on the west and Wisconsin, Illinois, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Mississippi on the east; flows generally south, and empties in Louisiana into the Gulf of Mexico by 5 mouths about lat. 29°-29° 10' N. It is navigable for steamboats to the Falls of St. Anthony, Minnesota (about 2,200 miles). The banks below the river level in Mississippi and Louisiana have to be protected by levees. The chief tributaries are the Minnesota, Des Moines, Missouri, St. Francis, White River, Arkansas, and Red River from the west, and the Wisconsin, Rock, Illinois, Ohio, and Yazoo from the east. It was discovered by De Soto in 1541; Marquette and Joliet descended it in 1673, and La Salle in 1682; it formed the western boundary of the United States 1783–1803; and its source was discovered by Schoolcraft in 1832. St. Paul, Minneapolis, Dubuque, St. Louis, Memphis, and New Orleans are on its banks. Length of the Mississippi itself, 2,900 miles. Length of the lower Mississippi with the Missouri, 4,200 miles. Basin, 1,257,545 square miles. The combined river is the longest stream in the world.

Mississippi. One of the Southern States of the United States of America, extending from about lat. 30° 10' to 35° N., and from long. 88° 5' to 91° 40' W. Capital, Jackson. It is bounded by Tennessee on the north, Alabama on the east, the Gulf of Mexico and Louisiana on the south, and is separated by the Mississippi on the west from Arkansas and in part from Louisiana. It is one of the Gulf States. The surface is hilly in part, but generally level. The chief industry is agriculture; the state is one of the most rich producers of cotton. It has 5 congressional districts, 5 representatives to Congress, and has 9 electoral votes. The region was visited by De Soto in 1539; the Mississippi River was explored by Marquette and La Salle; an attempt at settlement was made by the French under Le Moyne d'Iberville in 1699; and a settlement was made on the site of Natchez in 1716. The territory was ceded by France to Great Britain in 1763, part was ceded to the United States in 1783, and the remainder was acquired in 1811. Mississippi Territory was organized in 1798, and the State was admitted to the Union in 1817. It seceded Jan. 9, 1861, was the scene of various conflicts in the Civil War, including the siege of Vicksburg in 1863; and was readmitted Feb., 1870. Area, 46,340 square miles. Population (1890), 1,289,600.

Mississippi Valley. The region drained by the Mississippi and its affluents, lying in general between the Alleghanies on the east and the Rocky Mountains on the west. The basin includes the whole of Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, Missouri, Arkansas, South Dakota, Arkansas, Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky, and Tennessee; portions of Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, North Dakota, Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico, and Alabama, Mississippi; and small parts of New York, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, New Mexico and British America.

Miss Kilmansegg and her Precious Leg. A poem by Thomas Hood, which, "as a sustained piece of metrical humor, is absolutely unique."

The poem is full of rollicking, unhampered fancy; long as it is, the movement is so rapid that it almost seems to have been written at a heat — at least, can easily be read at a sitting. Though not so finished as Praed's pieces which constantly irritate us in the perusal of Hood's lighter pieces, it is the most lusty and characteristic of them all, standing at the close of the latter's fabulous working. It renders him the leading poet-humorist of his generation.
Stedman, Victorian Poets, p. 80.

Missolonghi (mis-sō-long'gē), or Mesolonghi (mā-sō-long'gē), mod. Gr. Mesolongion (mā-zō-long'gē-on). A town in the monarchy of Acarnania and Ætolia, Greece, situated on the Gulf of Patras in lat. 38° 22' N., long. 21° 25' E. It was successfully defended by the Greeks against the Turks in 1822 and 1823, and was besieged and taken by the Turks and Egyptians in 1825–26. Byron died there in 1824. Population (1889), 6,000.

Missoula (mi-zō'lą). A river in western Montana which unites with the Flathead to form Clarke's Fork. Its chief head streams are the Bitter Root, Deer Lodge, and Blackfoot rivers.

Missouri (mi-zō'ri). A tribe of the Teiwere division of the Siouan stock of North American Indians. Their name for themselves is Niutatci, those who reached the mouth (of the river); called Niwutje by the Kansa, which appellation may have been corrupted into Missouri. For many years they have been consolidated with the Oto. The population of the two tribes is given as 358. See Teiwere.

Missouri. [See above.] A river in the United States, the largest tributary of the Mississippi. It is formed by the junction of the Jefferson, Gallatin, of the Madison (which rises in the National Park) with the Jefferson; flows through Montana and Dakota; forms in part the boundary between Nebraska and Kansas on the right and Dakota, Iowa, and Missouri on the left; traverses Missouri; and unites with the Mississippi 17 miles north of St. Louis. It passes in Montana through the gorges of Gates of the Rocky Mountains, below which are the Great Falls. Bismarck, Yankton, Sioux City, Omaha, Council Bluffs, St. Joseph, Atchison, Leavenworth, and Kansas City are on its banks. Length (including Madison), 3,000 miles; navigable to Fort Benton (over 2,682 miles). For the total length of the stream to the sea, see Mississippi.

Missouri. A central State of the United States of America, extending from about lat. 36° to 40° 30' N., and from long. 89° 2' to 95° 44' W. Capital, Jefferson City; chief city, St. Louis. It is bounded by Iowa on the north, Illinois, Kentucky, and Tennessee on the east (separated from all three by the Mississippi), Arkansas on the south, and Indian Territory, Kansas, and Nebraska on the west (separated in part from Kansas and Nebraska by the Missouri). The surface is hilly, undulating, and partly prairie; the Ozark Mountains (low) are in the southwest. The State is rich in mineral wealth, especially iron (at Iron Mountain, Pilot Knob, Shepherd Mountain, all in the southeast), coal, and lead. The leading agricultural products are corn, wheat, tobacco, oats. The state is one of the first in the raising of live stock and in the production of wine and corn, and has important manufacturing industries, manufactures of flour, iron, etc., and flourishing domestic and foreign commerce. It has 114 counties, sends 2 senators and 15 representatives to Congress, and has 16 electoral votes. The territory was obtained by France in virtue of exploration: was first settled at St. Genevieve by the French about 1755; was ceded to Spain in 1763, was ceded back to France in 1800, formed part of the Louisiana Purchase of 1803; and was included in Louisiana Territory in 1805. Missouri Territory was formed in 1812, and Missouri was admitted to the Union as a slave State in 1821. Martial law was proclaimed there in 1861. It was the scene of several battles in the Civil War. Area, 65,350 square miles. Population (1890), 2,679,189.

Missouri, Great Falls of the. A cataract in the Missouri River, in Montana, above Port Benton. Width, 1 mile. Height, 92 feet.

Missouri Compromise. An agreement embodied in a clause of the act of Congress admitting Missouri as one of the United States, March 2, 1821. It was enacted that in all the territory ceded by France, known as Louisiana, north of 36° 30′ north lat., excepting Missouri, slavery should be forever prohibited; and on this concession by the pro-slavery party in Congress, Missouri was admitted as a slave State. In repeal in the act for the admission of Kansas and Nebraska it is of considerable historical importance in Kansas.

Miss Sara Sampson. A play by Lessing, produced in 1755.

He was a member of Parliament 1785–90, 1798–1806, and 1812–1818.

Mithra (mith'rä), or Mithras (mith'ras). In ancient Persian mythology, the god of light, later of the sun. His worship was introduced into Rome.

After Pontus in Asia Minor, previously held by Persia, had been conquered by Pompey, the worship of Mithras superseded that of Ormuzd, and spread over the Roman Empire. The Emperor Commodus was initiated into these Mysteries; and they have been maintained by a constant tradition, with their peculiar rites, to the present time. the candidate for admission, through the Secret Societies of the Middle Ages and the Rosicrucians, down to the modern faint relic of the Free Masons. The Mithraic rites supplied the model of the initiatory ceremonies observed in those societies, and are described by Justin Martyr and Tertullian as resembling the Christian sacraments. Between seven and nine admitted by the rite of baptism; they had a species of Eucharist; while the courage and endurance of the neophyte were tested by twelve successive trials demanding fortitude, undergone while in a cave constructed for the purpose, and lasted forty days before he was admitted to a participation in the Mysteries. The pectinated bas-relief of Mithras-rites have been all over Europe; and the burial-place of the Three Kings of Cologne, Caspar, Balthasar, and Melchior, was shown as the tombs of the Magians Beltehazzar, Sarasin, etc.

Mithridate (mēt-rē-dāt'). A tragedy by Racine, produced Jan. 13, 1673.

Mithridates (mith-ri-dā'tēz) (more correctly Mithradates (mith-ra-dā'tēz)) VI. Eupator, surnamed "The Great." Born about 132 B. C.: died 63 B. C. King of Pontus 120–63. He subjugated the peoples on the eastern shore of the Black Sea, and conquered the Crimea and southern Russia. He next attacked Paphlagonia, Cappadocia, and Bithynia, client states of Rome, which caused the interference of that power. War between the two nations followed, in which he made himself master of all the Roman possessions in Asia Minor, except Magnesia on the Meander, and caused a general massacre of the Italian inhabitants, said to have numbered 80,000, or, according to others, 150,000. He also instigated a rising of the European Greeks, to whose aid he sent a formidable land and naval force under his general Archelaus. Archelaus was defeated by Sulla at Chæronea in 86 and at Orchomenus in 85. Sulla crossed the Hellespont to Asia, and dictated a peace at Dardanus in 84. Mithridates accepted his first terms, paid a large indemnity, and restored all his conquests, retaining Pontus only. In 83 a second war broke out, owing to his failure completely to evacuate Cappadocia. He next conquered Murena invaded Pontus, but was defeated and forced to withdraw. Peace was restored in 81 on the basis of the treaty of Dardanus. In 74 a third war broke out, occasioned by an attempt on the part of Mithridates to take possession of Bithynia, which had been bequeathed to the Romans by his son-in-law Nicomedes III., late king of Bithynia. Mithridates defeated M. Aurelius Cotta at Chalcedon in 74, but was expelled from his own kingdom by Lucullus, and took refuge with his son-in-law Tigranes, king of Armenia. Lucullus defeated the latter at Tigranocerta in 69, but was unable to prevent Mithridates from reconquering Pontus and ravaging Bithynia and Cappadocia. He was superseded by Pompeius, who defeated Mithridates on the Lycos in 66, and compelled the surrender of Tigranes at Artaxata. Mithridates fled to Panticapæum, and was planning a new campaign when his troops revolted. He was at his own bidding put to death by a Celtic soldier in 63, after having vainly sought to kill himself by poison.

Mithridates, King of Pontus. A tragedy by Nathaniel Lee, produced in 1678.

Mithridatic Wars (mith-ri-dat'ik wârz). Three wars between Rome and Mithridates, king of Pontus. The Romans were commanded in the first (88–84 B. C.) by Sulla and his lieutenant Fimbria; in the second (83–81) by Murena; and in the third (74–63) by Lucullus, later by Pompey. In the last Mithridates and his ally Tigranes were defeated, and Pontus was annexed to Rome in 63.

Mitla (mēt'lä), or Mictlan (mēk-tlän'). [Nahuatl, 'place of the dead': called by the Zapotecs Lyó-Baa, entrance to the grave.] A group of large ruined buildings in the state of Oaxaca, Mexico, about 30 miles southeast of Oajaca City. They are built of adobe and stone, and some of them are elaborately ornamented with a kind of mosaic work produced by stones set in cement. There are also mural paintings. The origin and purpose of the Mitla buildings are unknown. At the time of the conquest they appear to have been occupied by Zapotec Indians. There is a modern village on the site.

Mitre (mē'trä). Bartolomé. Born at Buenos Ayres, June 26, 1821: died there, Jan., 1894.

An Argentine general, statesman, and author. Banished by Rosas, he lived successively in Uruguay, Bolivia, Peru, and Chile, and was a noted journalist in all those countries. He served in the Uruguayan army 1838–1846, and in the Bolivian army 1847; was colonel of artillery, took part in the overthrow of Rosas, 1852; opposed Urquiza; led the movement by which Buenos Ayres declared itself independent, Sept. 11, 1852; was made minister of the interior and later minister of war of the Buenos Ayres government; and in the latter capacity commanded the army which was defeated by Urquiza at Cepeda Oct. 23, 1859, the result being the admission of Buenos Ayres into the Argentine Confederation. Mitre was then elected governor of Buenos Ayres, May, 1860; and new difficulties having arisen with the federal government, he defeated Urquiza's army at Pavon, Sept. 11, 1861. Soon after Mitre was made president ad interim, and in Oct., 1862, was elected president of the New Argentine Republic for six years. With his term opened an era of great prosperity. During two years he commanded the allied army against Paraguay. (See Triple Alliance.) At the end of his term Mitre was made minister to Brazil. He was a presidential candidate in 1874, and, being defeated, headed an abortive rebellion. In 1891 he was again a candidate, but subsequently withdrew his name in favor of Bernardo Mitre founded "La Nacion," which became the most important journal of the Platine region, and remained under his direction until his death. Besides poems, essays, speeches, etc., he published two historical works, the "Historia de Belgrano" (1857 et seq.) and the "Historia de San Martin" (1884; English abridged translation 1893).

He has published "On the Genesis of Species" (1871), "Lessons in Elementary Anatomy" (1873), "The Cat" (1880), "Nature and Thought" (1882), etc.

Miwok, or Meewoc (mē'wok). The southern division of the Moquelumnan stock of North American Indians, comprising 23 small tribes whose pristine habitat extended from the Cosumnes to the Fresno, and from the snow-line of the Sierra Nevada to San Joaquin River, except a strip along the latter occupied by the Cholovone. The name signifies 'men' or 'people' in the dialect formerly spoken north of the Stanislaus. See Moquelumnan.

Mixco (més'kō). A city and stronghold of the ancient Cakchiquel Indians of Guatemala, about 25 miles north of the modern Guatemala City. It was on a nearly inaccessible hill, and was fortified with great skill. In 1525 the Spaniards, under Gonzalo Alvarado, besieged it for a month, and finally took it by assault after a terrible fight. The town was burned, and only its ruins remain. The surviving inhabitants were removed to the modern village of Mixco, 5 miles east of Guatemala.

Mixes (mē'hăz). An Indian race of southeastern Mexico, in the mountains of the isthmus of Tehuantepec (states of Oajaca and Chiapas). By language they are related to the Zoques (which see). Historians describe them as very savage, and cannibals; but they early submitted to the whites, and are now a degraded but peaceful part of the country population.

Mixtecs (mēs-tāks'), or Mixtecas (mēs-tā'käz). An Indian race of southern Mexico, in the mountains of western Oajaca and the adjacent parts of Guerrero and Puebla. At the period of the Spanish conquest they also occupied the corresponding parts of the Pacific coast, and at one time had extended eastward to the isthmus of Tehuantepec, from which they were driven by the Zapotecs. They were frequently at war with the Aztecs of Mexico. They were considerably advanced in civilization, built adobe or stone houses, were agriculturists but brave warriors, and had a form of picture-writing. The Mixtecs readily submitted to the Spaniards, and are now useful citizens. They number not less than 200,000. By their language they are allied to the Zapotecs (which see).

Mizar (mī'zär or mē'zär). [Ar. mizār, a waist-cloth or apron.] The familiar name of the bright second-magnitude double star ζ Ursæ Majoris. Smyth says the name was unknown to the Arabs, but was introduced in consequence of a conjecture of Scaliger's. The appropriateness is not evident. The same name is also, rarely, applied to ε Bootis.

Mizen (miz'en). A character in Charles Shadwell's play "The Fair Quaker of Deal."

In this character-piece Flip, the sea-brute, is contrasted with Beau Mizen, the sea-fop; but the latter is, in some degree, a copy of Baker's Maiden, the progenitor of the family of Dundreary. Dorax, English Stage, I. 213.

Mizpah (miz'pä), or Mizpeh (miz'pe). [Heb., 'watch-tower.'] The name of several places mentioned in Old Testament history. (a) A place of assembly in the land of the Jebusites, on the border of Jerusalem, was not made to serve as the site of a great city. On the contrary, it was an excellent spot for those federal rites which were to maintain the unity of the nation. The ark was never established there: but the soferi was induced to make it his habitual residence, and no doubt the political importance of Mispeh had some weight in the providential selection of Jerusalem for the brilliant destinies. Jerusalem is only a league from Mispeh, and from the top of the mountain the little acropolis (castello) of the Jebusites on the hill of Sion must have been visible. Renan, Hist. of the People of Israel, I. 302.

Mizraim (miz-rā'im). The Hebrew name of Egypt.

Mizraim, the brother of Cush, is the Hebrew name of Egypt. It signifies 'the two Mazors,' or walls of fortification. On the Asiatic side Egypt was defended from attack by a chain of fortresses, sometimes called Shur, 'the wall,' by the Canaanites, and it was from this line of defence that the name of Mazor was derived. The name, however, did not apply to the whole of Egypt. It denoted only Lower or Northern Egypt, which extended from the sea to the neighbourhood of the modern Cairo. The rest of the country was Upper Egypt, called Pa-Ka-Ra, 'the land of the south,' in ancient Egyptian, the Pathros of the Old Testament (Isaiah xi. 11). The division of Egypt into two provinces dated from prehistoric times, and has been remembered through all the vicissitudes of Egyptian history down to the present day. It was essentially 'the double land,' and its rulers wore a double crown. Hence the use of the dual form in the two Mazors, in Hebrew. Here and there, where Lower Egypt is alone alluded to, the singular Mazor is employed, but otherwise the dual "Mizraim" only is found throughout the Old Testament. Sayce, Races of the O. T., p. 52.

Mjöllnir (myėl'nir). [ON.] In Old Norse mythology, Thor's hammer, "the crusher," made by the dwarfs. It was the trusty weapon of Thor in his constant warfare against the giants.

Mjösen (myė'sen), Lake. The largest lake in Norway, about 35 miles northeast of Christiania at the nearest point. Length, 62 miles. Greatest depth, 1,515 feet.

Mlawa (mlä'vä). A town in the government of Plozk, Russian Poland, 67 miles north-northwest of Warsaw. Population (1890), 10,078.

Mnemosyne (nē-mos'i-nē). [Gr. Μνημοσύνη, the mother of the Muses.] In Greek mythology, the goddess of memory, daughter of Uranus (Heaven) and Ge (Earth), and mother, by Zeus, of the Muses.

Mnesicles (nē'sik-lēz). [Gr. Μνησικλῆς.] Architect of the Propylæum (begun 343 B. C.). It was 5 years in building, and cost about $2,000,000. An inscription with his name, but later in time, has been found among the ruins of the Propylæum.

Mnevis (nē'vis). The ancient Egyptian sacred bull of Heliopolis.

Apis of Memphis, Mnévis of Heliopolis, and Pakis of Hermonthis, are all links that bind together the Egypt of the Pharaohs and the Egypt of the stone age. They were the sacred animals of the clans which first settled in these localities, and their identification with the deities of the official religion must have been a slow process, never fully carried out, in fact, in the minds of the lower classes. Sayce, Anc. Empires, p. 66.

Moab (mō'ab). A Semitic tribe settled at the southeastern end of the Dead Sea (the modern district of Kerak). In Gen. xix. Moab and Ammon are represented as descendants of Lot, and their names are explained from their incestuous origin. The Moabites appear to have been a warlike tribe, and the Israelites during their wanderings through the desert tried to avoid an encounter with them. During the period of the Judges they opposed the Israelites until they were routed by Ehud (Judges iii.). Saul and David also seem to have had such a Moabitess, subjugated them. After Solomon's death Moab fell to the northern kingdom. After Ahab's death Mesha refused to pay tribute. Jues were afterward, according to the cuneiform inscriptions, subjected to Assyria, Shalman, Camoshnadab, and Mussar being mentioned as kings of Moab paying tribute. They participated in the fall of Jerusalem through the Babylonians, and Nebuchadnezzar subjected them on his expedition against Egypt. They appear after the exile as seeking to maintain friendly relations with the Judeans. Later they were subjected to the Nabatæans, the Maccabees, and the Romans. Chemos was their principal divinity; another was Baal Peor. The only authentic monument of the Moabite civilization thus far known is the so-called Moabite Stone. See below.

Moabite Stone. A slab of black basalt bearing an inscription of 34 lines in Hebrew-Phenician characters: the oldest monument of the Semitic alphabet. It was found in 1868 at the ancient Dibon of Moab. Before it could be removed it was broken in many pieces, through the jealousies of Arab tribes, but a squeeze of the inscription had been previously taken, and the chief fragments are now in the Louvre museum. The stone is the most important surviving relic of Moabite civilization, and is believed to date from about 900 B. C. The inscription records the victories of King Mesha over the Israelites. See Mesha.

Moadoc. See Modoc.

Moallakât (mō-äl-lä-kät'). A collection of seven Arabic poems, composed by different authors in the 6th and 7th centuries.

Moaria (mō-ā'ri-ä). [NL.] A hypothetical South Pacific continent of which only New Zealand and other Oceanian or Polynesian islands remain: so named from the supposed former range of the moa. Its assumed existence accounts for many features of the present geographical distribution of animals and plants. The name was proposed by Dr. Mantell.

Moatcaht (mō'äch-ät), or Mowachaht. The people to whom the name Nootka was first applied, a tribe of North American Indians living near Nootka Sound, Vancouver Island, British Columbia. They numbered 254 in 1884. See Aht.

Moawiyah (mō-ä-wē'yä). Governor of Syria, and, after his victory over Ali, calif 660–679 A. D. He founded the dynasty of the Ommiads, which held the califate for 90 years (660–750) with Damascus as capital.

Mobangi. Same as Ubangi.

Moberly (mō'bėr-li). The capital of Randolph County, central Missouri. Population (1890), 8,213.

Mobile (mō-bēl'). A river in Alabama which is formed by the union of the Alabama and Tombigbee, and falls into Mobile Bay. Length, about 45 miles.

Mobile. A city, capital of Mobile County, Alabama, situated on Mobile River in lat. 30° 41′ N., long. 88° 2′ W. It is the only seaport and the largest city of the State. It has a large trade in timber, naval stores, coal, etc., and is one of the leading cities in the country for the export of cotton. It was founded by De Bienville in 1702; was the capital of Louisiana until 1723; passed to Great Britain in 1763, and to Spain in 1783; was taken by the Americans under Wilkinson in 1813; and became a city in 1819. It was occupied by the Federals April 12, 1865. It has now direct lines to Liverpool and New York. Population (1890), 31,076.

Mobile Bay. An inlet of the Gulf of Mexico, in the southwestern part of Alabama. Length, about 30 miles.

Mobile Bay, Battle of. A naval victory gained Aug. 5, 1864, by the Federals (with 7 sloops of war and 4 iron-clad monitors), under Farragut, over the Confederates (with the ram Tennessee, which had to surrender, and 3 gunboats), under Buchanan.

Mobile Point. A sandy point at the eastern entrance of Mobile Bay: the site of Fort Morgan (previously Fort Bowyer).

Mobilian. See Creek.

Mobimas. See Mocimas.

Möbius (mė'bē-ōs). August Ferdinand. Born at Schulpforta, Prussia, Nov. 17, 1790; died at Leipsic, Sept. 26, 1868. A German mathematician and astronomer, professor at Leipsic from 1816. His chief work is "Der barycentrische Kalkul" (1827).

Möbius, Paul Heinrich August. Born at Leipsic, May 31, 1825; died at Friedrichroda, June 8, 1889. A German miscellaneous writer, son of A. F. Möbius. He published collections of riddles under the pseudonym Paul.

Möbius, Theodor. Born at Leipsic, June 22, 1821; died there, April 25, 1890. A German philologist, son of A. F. Möbius, appointed professor at Leipsic in 1859, and at Kiel in 1865. He has published numerous works on Scandinavian philology and literature.

Mocarabians (mō-ka-rā'bi-anz). See the extract.

A complete toleration had been granted by the first conquerors to the Christian Goths, who, under the name of Mocarabians (mixed Arabians), lived in the midst of the Mussulmans. Sismondi, Lit. of South of Europe, I. 81.

Mocetenas. See Mosetenas.

Mocha (mō'kä; Arab. pron. mō'chä). A seaport in Yemen, Arabia, situated on the Red Sea in lat. 13° 20′ N., long. 43° 13′ E.; long famous for its export of coffee. Population, about 5,000.

Mochica. See Chimu and Yuncas.

Mock Astrologer, The. See Examen's Love, An.

Mock Doctor, The. 1. A farce by Henry Fielding, slightly altered from Molière's comedy "Le medecin malgré lui," and produced with Garrick in the east about 1736.—2. An English libretto of Gounod's "Le medecin malgré lui," by Charles Kenney. The opera was produced under this name at London in 1865.

Möckern (mek'ern). A small town in Prussian Saxony, situated on the Elde 14 miles east of Magdeburg. Here, April 5, 1813, the Prussians under York defeated the French under Eugène de Beauharnais.

Möckern. A village 2 miles northwest of Leipsic. Here, Oct. 16, 1813, Blücher defeated the French under Marmont (part of the battle of Leipsic).

Mocoas (mō-kō'äz). A tribe of Indians in southern Colombia, about the upper Caqueta or Japurá and its branches. They are an agricultural and peaceable race, and are noted for their skill in weaving and dyeing cotton fabrics, and in some small industries. At present they are partially civilized, and speak a corrupt dialect of the Omicha. Their own language, with that of the Mesayas and other neighboring tribes, appears to constitute a distinct stock. The Encabos or Ingabos, on the Eugaio River, a branch of the Caqueta, are either identical with the Mocoas or closely allied to them.

Mocobis (mō-kō-bēz'), or Mbocobis. An Indian tribe or group of tribes in the northern part of the Argentine Republic (Gran Chaco region), about the river Vermejo. They are still numerous, subsist mainly by hunting and rapine, but have cattle and horses derived from Spanish stock. Their villages are composed of light huts, and are frequently moved in search of fresh pasture. The Mocobis belong to the Guayeuru linguistic stock, and are closely allied to the extinct Abipones and the modern Tobas, with whom, however, they are almost constantly at war.

Modena (mō-dā'nä). A province in the compartimento of Emilia, Italy. Area, 987 square miles. Population (1891), 286,716.

Modena. The capital of the province of Modena, Italy, situated between the Secchia and the Panaro, in lat. 44° 39′ N., long. 10° 56′ E.; the ancient Mutina. The cathedral, consecrated in 1184, is a well-designed Romanesque structure. The west façade, one of the best of the kind in Italy, has three round-arched portals, a gallery of graceful triple arcades which is continued around the church, a large wheel-window, and much interesting sculpture. There are two sculptured porches on the south side. The three-aisled interior contains interesting sculpture and tombs. The Ghirlandina Tower, the campanile of the cathedral, finished to the spire in 1345, is one of the best of its kind. The height is 315 feet. The massive square lower stage, about 200 feet high, bears the slender spire, which springs from an octagon of two arcaded tiers and is pierced with flower-like openings (whence the name of the tower). Other objects of interest are the art academy, university, public library, library, and ducal palace. Modena became a Roman colony about 183 B. C. It was situated on the Æmilian Way, and was a flourishing Roman city. It became the capital of the duchy of Modena, ruled by the Este family, and was famous in the 16th century for the sculpture of terra-cottas. (See Matrimonial War, and Modenese, Secchia of.) Population (1892), commune, 59,000.

Modena, Duchy of. A former duchy of northern Italy, comprising the modern provinces of Modena, Massa e Carrara, and Reggio (in Emilia). The family of Este became rulers of Modena about 1290; it was made a duchy in 1452; was annexed to the Cisalpine Republic in 1796; and passed to the Austrian line in 1814. There was an unsuccessful insurrection in 1848–49; the duke was deposed in 1859; and the duchy was united to Italy in 1860.

Modern Athens, The. Boston or Edinburgh.

Modern Babylon, The. London.

Modern Messalina, The. Catharine II. of Russia.

Modern Painters. A work on art, by John Ruskin (published 1843, 1846, 1856, and 1860).

Modica (mod'i-kä). A town in the province of Syracuse, Sicily, 30 miles southwest of Syracuse: the ancient Motyea. There are remarkable prehistoric caves in the vicinity. Population (1881), 38,206.

Mödling (mēd'ling). A town in Lower Austria, 9 miles south-southwest of Vienna. Population (1890), communes, 11,120.

Modoc, or Modock (mō'dok). [Pl., also Modoes.] A tribe of North American Indians which formerly occupied the shores of Little Klamath, Modoc, and Clear lakes, Oregon, and the valleys of Lost River and its tributaries. It also had transitory settlements eastward to Goose and Warner lakes, on the California border. After their conflict with the United States government in 1872–73, through which they became well known, about 80 of the Modoc were removed to Indian Territory. The remainder, about 200, have resided since 1869 near Yaneks, on Sprague River, Klamath reservation, Oregon. The name is adapted from Moátoknı, signifying "southerners." (See Lutuamian.) Written by some authorities Mo'-ak.

Modoc War. A war between the United States government and the Modoc Indians led by Captain Jack. The Modocs refused in 1872 to go to the Klamath reservation in southern Oregon, and went to the Lava Beds in northern California between the lakes of the Indians, April, 1873, the former was treacherously killed. War followed; the band had to surrender; and Captain Jack was executed.

Modugno (mō-dön'yō). A town in the province of Bari, Apulia, Italy, 6 miles west-southwest of Bari. Population (1881), 8,525; commune, 9,480.

Moe (mō'e), Jörgen Ingebrektsen. Born on the estate Moe, Ringerige, Norway, 1813; died at Christiansand, 1880. A Norwegian poet and theologian. His father was a peasant. He studied theology in Christiania after 1830. His first literary venture was the little "Samling af Sange, Folkeviser og Stevi norske Almuedialekter" ("Collection of Songs, Ballads, and Verses in the Norwegian Popular Dialects"), published in 1840. With public assistance he now set about the collecting, in various parts of Norway, of popular literature of the same character; and in 1841, in collaboration with Peter Christian Asbjornsen (born 1812), published "Norske Folke Eventyr" ("Norwegian Folk-Tales"). A collection of his later poems appeared in 1845 under the title "At hænge paa Juletræet" ("To Hang on the Christmas Tree"). His earlier poems were collected and published as "Digte" ("Poems") in 1848. In 1853 he became a clergyman, and ultimately was made bishop of Christiansand. His collected works, "Samlede Skrifter," were published at Christiania in 1877 in 2 vols.

Mœn (mē'en). An island in the Baltic, belonging to Denmark, situated southeast of Zealand. Chief town, Stege. Area, 81 square miles. Population, about 13,000.

Mœnus (mē'nus). The Latin name of the Main.

Mœræ (mē'rē). [Gr. Moipai.] The Greek goddesses of fate: the Fates. Homer uses the name in the singular, of a single divinity, and says that the phrase Heaks oi-ch-them the "spinners of the thread of life." By Hesiod they are spoken of both as daughters of Night and as daughters of Zeus and Themis. Hesiod names them as three in number: Clotho (the spinner), Lachesis (disposer of lots), and Atropos (the inevitable). The first spins the thread of life, the second fixes its length, and the third severs it. Also Moirai.

Mœris (mē'ris). Lake. [Gr. ἡ Μοίριος λίμνη.] According to Herodotus, an artificial lake in Middle Egypt, west of the Nile, 50 miles southwest of Cairo, near the modern Lake Birket-el-Korn. Its existence has been doubted. See the extract.

> A king named Mœris, desired to erect a reservoir in the Fayoum which should neutralise the evil effects of insufficient or superabundant inundations. This reservoir was named, after him, Lake Mœris. If the supply fell below the average, then the dead kings were let loose, and Lower Egypt and the Western Delta were flooded to the needful height. If next year the inundation came down in too great force, Lake Mœris received and stored the surplus till such time as the waters began to subside. Two pyramids, each surmounted by a sitting colossus, one representing the king and the other his queen, were erected in the midst of the lake. Such is the tale told by Herodotus, and it is a tale which has considerably embarrassed our modern engineers and topographers. How, in fact, was it possible to find in the Fayoum a site which could have contained a basin measuring at least ninety miles in circumference? The most reasonable theory is that of Linant, who supposes Lake Mœris to have extended over the whole of the lowlying land which skirts the Libyan cliffs between Hilahoun and Medinet-el-Fayooun; but recent explorations have proved that the dikes by which this pretended reservoir was bounded are modern works, erected probably within the last two hundred years. I no longer believe that Lake Mœris ever existed. If Herodotus did actually visit the Fayoum, it was probably in summer, at the time of the High Nile, when the whole district presents the appearance of an inland sea. What he took for the shores of this lake were the embankments which divided it into basins and acted as highways between the various towns. Maspero, Egypt, Archæol. (trans.), p. 33.

Moero (mwā'rō) or Meru (mā'rō). Lake. A lake in central Africa, about lat. 9° 30′ S. It is traversed by the upper Kongo.

Mœsia (mē'shiä). [Gr. Mœsia.] In ancient geography, a province of the Roman Empire, lying north of the Balkans, south of the Danube, and west of the Black Sea, corresponding nearly to modern Bulgaria and Servia. It was made a Roman province about 16 B. C.; was divided later into Mœsia Superior (in the west) and Mœsia Inferior (in the east); and was overrun by Goths in the 3d and 4th centuries. The Mœsogoths settled there in 376.

Mœsogoths (mē'so-goths). Those Goths who settled in Mœsia, and there, under the protection of the Roman emperors, devoted themselves to agricultural pursuits. The Mœsogoths were converted to Christianity in its Arian form by Bishop Ulfilas in the 4th century. See Goths.

Mofaddhal (mō-fad'dāl), Abul Abbas Al-. Died 784 A. D. An Arabian poet, philologist, and genealogist. His principal work was a collection of the most celebrated longer poems of the Arabs, 128 in number, called after him the "Mofaddhalat." This was is the oldest anthology of Arabian poets. His other works were a book of proverbs, a treatise on prosody, and a vocabulary.

Moffat (mof'at). A watering-place in Dumfriesshire, Scotland, 43 miles south by west of Edinburgh. It has mineral springs. Population (1891), 2,290.

Moffat, Robert. Born at Ormiston, East Lothian, Dec. 21, 1795; died at Leigh, Aug. 8, 1883. A celebrated Scottish missionary. For a while he was occupied as under-gardener, but after a course of study he was accepted by the London Missionary Society in 1816, arrived at Cape Town Jan. 13, 1817, and labored among the Bechuana until 1870. By 1826 he had prepared a spelling-book of the Bechuana language. Parts of the Scriptures were translated into Bechuana. The New Testament was completed and carried by him to London in 1838. His daughter became Mrs. David Livingstone, who married his daughter in 1844. The translation of the Old Testament into Bechuana was finished in 1857. He returned to England from Cape Colony in 1870. He published "Missionary Labours in South Africa" (1842).

Mogador (mog-a-dōr'), or Suera (swā'rä). A seaport in Morocco, situated on the Atlantic in lat. 31° 30′ N., long. 9° 43′ W. It has important commerce. The French bombarded it in 1844. Population, about 19,000.

Mogul (mō-gul'), Great. An Indian diamond, said to have been seen at the court of Aurungzeb in 1665, and to have weighed 280 carats.

Moguls (mō-gulz'). The Mongols or Mongolians; specifically, in history, the subjects of the Mogul empire (see below).

Moguls (mō-gulz'), or Mughals (mō'galz), Empire of the. A Mohammedan Tatar empire in India. It began with Baber, conqueror of Hindustan, 1526; and was at its height under Akbar, Jahangir, Shah Jehan, and Aurung-Zeb. After the death of the last-named (1707), the empire split up and the power passed to the Mahrattas and British. The last (nominal) emperor was deposed in 1857 (died 1862).

Mohács (mō-hächˊ). A town in the county of Baranya, Hungary, situated on the Danube in lat. 45° 58′ N., long. 18° 37′ E. Here, Aug. 29, 1526, the Turks under Soliman II. defeated the Hungarians under Louis II.; and Aug. 12, 1687, the Imperialists under Charles of Lorraine inflicted a crushing defeat on the Turks. Population (1890), 18,403.

Mohammed (mō-hamʻed), or Mahomet (ma-homʻet). [‘The praised one’: the name is also written Mahomed, Muhammad (the Arabic form), Mahmoud, Mehemet, etc.] Born at Mecca, Arabia, Aug., 570: died at Medina, Arabia, June 8, 632. The founder of Mohammedanism, or Islam (‘surrender,’ namely, to God), and the last of the posthumous son of Abdallah by his wife Amina, of the family of Hashim, the noblest among the Koreish, and was brought up in the desert among the Banu Saad by a Bedouin woman named Halima. At the age of six he lost his mother, and at eight his grandfather, when he was cared for by his uncle Abu-Talib. When about twelve years old (582) he accompanied a caravan to Syria, and may on this occasion have come for the first time in contact with Jews and Christians. A few years later he took part in the “sacrilegious war” (so called because carried on during the sacred months, when fighting was forbidden) which raged between the Koreish and the Banu Hawazin 580–590. He attended sundry preachings and recitations of the Koran, and thus acquired his peculiar moral and rhetorical powers and his religious feelings; and for some time was occupied as a shepherd, to which he later referred as being in accordance with the career as a prophet, even as it was with that of Moses and David. When twenty-five years old he entered the service of the widow Khadijah, and made a second journey to Syria, on which he again had an opportunity to come in frequent contact with Jews and Christians, and to acquire some knowledge of their religious teachings. He soon married Khadijah, who was fifteen years his senior. Of the six children which she bore him, Fatima became the most famous. In 605 he attained some influence in Mecca by settling a dispute about the rebuilding of the Kaaba. The impressions which he had gathered from his contact with Judaism and Christianity, and from Arabic lore, began now strongly to engage his mind. He frequently retired to solitary places, especially to the cave of Mount Hira, north of Mecca. He passed at that time (he was then about forty years old) through great mental struggles, and repeatedly contemplated suicide. It must have been during these lonely contemplations that the yearnings for a messenger from God for his people, and the thought that he himself might be destined to fulfil this mission, were born in his ardent mind. During one of his reveries, in the month of Ramadhan, 610, he beheld in sleep the angel Gabriel, who ordered him to read from a scroll which he held before him the words which begin the 96th verse (chapter) of the Koran. After the lapse of some time, a second vision came, and then the revelations began to follow one another in rapid succession. His belief in his mission as apostle and prophet of God was now firmly established. The first convert was his wife Khadijah, then followed the faithful friend Abu-Bekr, and his other adopted son Zeid, and Abu-Bekr, afterward his father-in-law and first successor (calif). Gradually about 50 adherents rallied about him. But after three years preaching the unity of the Meccans rose against him, so that part of his followers had to resort to Abyssinia for safety in 614. This is termed the first hejira. Mohammed in the meanwhile continued his meetings in the house of one of his disciples, Arqaan, in front of the Kaaba, which later became known as the “House of Islam.” At one time he offered to make a compromise, admitting their gods into his system as intercessors with the Supreme Being, but, becoming conscience-stricken, took back his words. The conversion of Hamza and Omar and 29 others in 615–616 strengthened his cause. The Koreish excommunicated Mohammed and his followers, who were forced to live in retirement. In 620, at the pilgrimage, he won over to his doctrines a small party from Medina. In Medina, whither a teacher was deputed, the new religion spread rapidly. To this period belongs the vision or dream of the miraculous night ride on the winged horse Borak, to Jerusalem, where he was received by the prophets, and thence ascended to heaven. In 622 more than 70 persons from Medina bound themselves to stand by Mohammed. The Meccans proposed to kill him, and he fled on the 20th of June, 622, to Medina. This is known as the hejira (‘the flight’), and marks the beginning of the Mohammedan era. Thus ended a turbulent period in the activity of Mohammed. He was thus far a religious preacher and persuader; he became in his Medinian period a legislator and warrior. He built mosques, established the institution of Ayesha. In 624 the first battle for the faith took place between Mohammed and the Meccans in the plain of Badr, in which the latter were defeated. At this time, also, Mohammed began bitterly to inveigh against the Jews, who did not recognize his claims to be the “greater prophet” promised by Moses. He changed the attitude of prayer (kibla) from the direction of Jerusalem to that of the Kaaba in Mecca, appointed Friday as the day for public worship, and instituted the fast of Ramadhan and the tithe or poorrate. The Jewish tribe of the Banu Kainuka, settled at Medina, was driven out; while of another Jewish tribe, the Banu Kuraiza, all the men, 700 in number, were massacred. In 625 Mohammed and his followers were defeated by the Meccans in the battle of Ohud. The following years were filled out with expeditions. One tribe after another submitted to Mohammed, until in 631 something like a definite Mohammedan empire was established. In 632 the prophet made his last pilgrimage to Mecca, known as the “farewell pilgrimage,” or the pilgrimage of the “announcement” or “Islam.” In the same year he died while planning an expedition against the frontier of the Byzantine empire. Mohammed was a little above the middle height, of a commanding figure, and is described as being of a modest, tender, and generous disposition. His manner of life was very simple and frugal. He mended his own clothes, and his common diet was barley-bread and water. But he enjoyed perfumes and the charms of women. His character appears composed of the strongest inconsistencies. He could be tender, kind, and liberal, but on occasions indulged in cruel and perfidious assassinations. With regard to his prophetic claims, it is as difficult to assume that he was sincere throughout, or self-deceived, as that he was throughout an impostor. In his doctrines there is practically nothing original. The legends of the Koran are chiefly drawn from the Old Testament and the rabbinical literature, which Mohammed must have learned from a Jew near Mecca, though he presents them as original revelations by the angel Gabriel. See Koran.

Mohammed I., or Mahomet. Sultan of the Turks 1413–21, a younger brother of Bajazet I.

Mohammed II., surnamed “The Conqueror” and “The Great.” Born about 1430; died 1481. Sultan of Turkey 1451–81, son of Amurath II. whom he succeeded. He besieged and captured Constantinople in 1453; and captured the Morea, Servia, Bosnia, Albania, and the Crimea (1475). He was defeated by Hungary at Belgrad in 1456, and unsuccessfully besieged Rhodes in 1480.

Mohawk (moʻhäk). [Pl., also Mohawks. The word is derived from the Algonquin maqua, bears.] A tribe of North American Indians. The Hurons called them Agochronon, abbreviated by the French to Agnie. Their villages were along the valley of the Mohawk River, New York, but they claimed the territory north to the St. Lawrence and south to the Delaware River watershed and the Catskill Mountains. They were the first tribe of the region to obtain firearms, and their frontier position made them soconspicuous that their name was often used by the English and the New England tribes for the whole Iroquois Confederacy. Their present (1893) number is over 2,000. See Iroquois.

Mohawk (moʻhäk). A river in New York which joins the Hudson 9 miles north of Albany. It forms the Cohoes Falls (70 feet high) near its mouth. Length, about 175 miles.

Mohegan (mō-hēʻgan), or Monhegan (mon-hēʻgan). A tribe of North American Indians. They once lived chiefly on Thames River, Connecticut, and claimed a large territory extending eastward into Massachusetts and Rhode Island and westward almost to Hudson. After the destruction of the Pequots in 1673 they claimed their country. They had once formed one tribe with those Indians under Sassacus against whom Lucas rebelled and fled Thames River band. On the fall of Sassacus in 1637, most of the survivors of the Pequots came under the Mohegan chief. After the death of King Philip in 1676, the Mohegan were the only important body in the region. They became scattered, some joining the Brotherton Indians in New York. See Mahican and Algonquin.

Mohun (mōʻhun), Charles, fifth Baron Mohun. Born about 1675; killed in a duel in Hyde Park, London, Nov. 15, 1712. An English desperado, the eldest son of the fourth Baron Mohun. On Dec. 9, 1692, he was associated with Captain Richard Hill in the murder of William Mountfort the actor. From 1694 to 1697 he served in Flanders. After 1699 he sat in the House of Lords as a Scottish peer. He was repeatedly engaged in duels, and twice tried for murder and acquitted. In 1701 he was involved in a protracted lawsuit with James Douglas, fourth duke of Hamilton, over the estate of the Earl of Macclesfield, which resulted in a duel and the death of both parties. This duel (Mohun being represented by a fictitious “Harry” Mohun) figures in Thackeray’s “Henry Esmond.”

Mohun, Michael. Born about 1625: died at London, Oct., 1684. An English actor. Before the civil war he performed under Beeston at the Cockpit, Drury Lane. He belonged to the company of Charles I. and in Flanders. He returned with Charles II., and was with Killigrew’s company 1660–82. Pepys calls him the “best actor in the world,” and he was called to “speak as Shakspere would.” He played at the Theatre Royal after April 8, 1663, and in the theater of Lincoln’s Inn Fields after 1672. He was very versatile, and played with equal ease a succession of classical heroes, modern rakes, simpletons, etc.

Mojos (mo'hōz). An Indian tribe of northern Bolivia, now (1894) living about the great affluents of the Madeira River, especially on the Manoré. Before the conquest they probably numbered at least 250,000. They were a stalwart, industrious, and relatively civilized people, and in the 17th century, and have ever since remained devout Catholics. Fifteen large missions were established in their territory, and still exist as villages: the largest, Trinidad (founded 1687), is now the capital of Beni. The Mojos are much sought after as engagés at rubber gatherings. They are industrious and excel in artistic work. The tribe has been greatly reduced, principally by epidemics, but is still said to number 30,000 persons; its language, also, is still in use, as all the mission Indians are classed within them. They belong to the great Arawak or Maipure stock. Also written Mojos. Their language is sometimes called Moje or Moxa.

Mokanna (mo-kan'nä) (surname of Atha ben Hakem, [Ar., 'veiled.'] Killed about 780. A Mohammedan impostor in Khorasan. He is the hero of the "Veiled Prophet of Khorassan" in the first part of Moore's "Lalla Rookh."

Molbech, Christian Knud Frederik. Born at Copenhagen, July 20, 1821; died at Kiel, May 8, 1888. A Danish poet and linguist. He studied at the Copenhagen University after 1839. In 1840 appeared a first volume of poems, "Billeder af Sesu Liv" ("Pictures from the Life of Jesus"). The romantic drama "Klosterkongens Brud" ("The Bride of the Mountain King") appeared in 1845, in which year also was produced the drama "Vennskabeget" ("The Vennsberg"). A collection of poems with the title "Brudog Tvelight") appeared in 1851. "Dante," a tragedy, is from 1852. In 1855 he was made professor of the Danish language and literature at Kiel, which position he held until 1864, when he returned to Copenhagen and began work as a journalist. In 1863 had appeared "Digte lyriske og dramatiske" ("Poems Lyric and Dramatic"). Afterward, as censor at the royal theater, he again turned his attention to the drama, and has written the comedy "Rentekskriveren" ("The Financier"), and the dramas "Ambosius" and "Faraos Ring" ("Pharaoh's Ring"). He is also the translator of Dante's "Divine Comedy" ("Gud-lomlige Komedie," the first part of which appeared in 1853).

Mold (mōld). A town in Flintshire, North Wales, situated on the Alyn 18 miles southsouthwest of Liverpool. Population (1891), 4,457.

Moldau (mōl'dou). The principal river in Bohemia. It rises in the Bohmerwald, flows past Prague, and joins the Elbe 15 miles north of Prague. Length, 260 miles.

Moldavia (mol-dā'vi-ä), G. Moldau (mōl'dou), F. Moldavie (mōl-dä-vē'). A former principality, now a part of Rumania. Chief city, Jassy. It is bounded by Galicia and Russia on the north, Russia (separated by the Pruth) on the east, Wallachia on the south, and Transylvania (separated by the Carpathians) on the west. It is mountainous in the west, and is traversed by the Sereth. It was founded early in the 14th century (see the extract); became tributary to Turkey late in the 15th century; was ruled later by Fanariot families; and came later under Russian influence. Alexander John Cusa was elected prince in 1859. It was formally united with Wallachia in 1862. See Rumania.

Another Roumanian migration, passing from the land of Marmaros north of Transylvania, founded the principality of Moldavia between the Carpathians and the Dniester. This too stood to the Hungarian crown in the same shifting relation as Great Wallachia, and sometimes transferred its vassalage to Lithuania and Poland.

Molé (mō-lā'), Comte Louis Matthieu. Born at Paris, Jan. 24, 1781; died at his Château Champlatreux, Nov. 25, 1855. A French politician, minister of foreign affairs 1830, and premier 1836–39.

Molé, Matthieu. Born 1584; died 1656. A French politician. He was appointed president of the Parliament of Paris by Richelieu in 1641, a post which he retained until 1653. He became keeper of the great seal in 1651.

Molech (mō'lek), or Moloch (mō'lok). [King.] In 1 Ki. xi. 7, he is mentioned as an idol of the Ammonites, but the worship of Molech was spread among all the Canaanitish and Semitic tribes.] A form of Baal, the sun-god, or the personification of the male generative principle in nature. Molech represents the sun in his fierce destructive aspect. The worship of Molech consisted in offering human sacrifices. The god was represented with a bull's head and long ears, the latter of which were lifted up to an opening in the breast of the brass statue and rolled into the furnace blazing inside. Whether the victims were first killed is not certain: is a disputed question. The worship of Molech was at different periods introduced into Israel, with its principal place in the valley of Hinnom: so under Ahaz (king of Judah 734–728 B. C.), Manasseh (697–642), and Amon (642–640). In the cuneiform inscriptions malik ('ruler,' properly 'counselor') can be the epithet of any god, but it is especially applied to Adar, who is among others the god of the destructive south or midday sun, and in the Old Testament is called Adrammelech (Adar-malik): to him children were burned (2 Ki. xvii. 31), although in the Assyrian-Babylonian literature no reference to human sacrifices in honor of a divinity has been found. At Carthage the children of Hamilcar were officially suppressed by the emperor Tiberius (14–37 A. D.).

Molière (mō-lyār'): the stage name of Jean Baptiste Poquelin (pōk-lañ'). Born at Paris, Jan. 15, 1622; died there, Feb. 17, 1673. A celebrated French dramatist and actor, the greatest French writer of comedies. He graduated from the Jesuits' College in Paris, after spending five years under the guidance of Chapelle, Bernier, and Cyrano de Bergerac (1636–41). Even before graduation Molière was pronounced the office of tapissier valet de chambre to the king, a distinction already held by his family for two generations. He was not yet twenty when he followed the court to Narbonne on the memorable trip that witnessed the execution of Cinq-Mars and the last victory of Richelieu. At twenty-three he began to devote his entire time to acting and play-writing. At the head of a troop of actors he performed in Paris and the provinces (1645–58). He settled down finally at Paris, where he was very successful until 1666. From that time on, the enmities contracted in his public career and the troubles in his own house embittered his life, told on his work, and probably hastened his death. He was seized, while acting, with a fit, and died a few hours later. Molière was one of the most brilliant geniuses of all time. His comedies include "Les précieuses ridicules" (1659), "École des maris" (1661), "École des femmes" (1662), "Le mariage forcé" (1664), "Le misanthrope" (1666), "Le médecin malgré lui" (1666), "Tartufe" (1667), "Amphitryon" (1668), "L'Avare" (1668), "Le bourgeois gentilhomme" (1670), "Les fourberies de Scapin" (1671), "Les femmes savantes" (1672), "Le malade imaginaire" (1673), etc. His works were published for the first time as "Œuvres de M. Molière" (1674). The first complete set, edited by Vinot and La Grange, was entitled "Œuvres de M. Molière, revues, corrigées et augmentées" (1682). The best modern edition of Molière's complete plays was made by Despois (finished by Paul Mesnard) in the "Collection des grands écrivains" (1873–89).

Independently of the characters which Molière shares with all the great names of literature, his fertility and lustiness of thought, the delicacy of expression in which he clothes it, and his accurate observation of human life, there are two points in his drama which belong, in the highest degree, to him alone. One is the extraordinary manner in which he handles the comic and tragic masque with the true spirit of refined comedy. This manner has been spoken of by unfriendly critics as "exaggerated," but the reproach argues a want of perception. Even the most roaring farces of Molière, even such pieces as "M. de Pourceaugnac" and the "Bourgeois Gentilhomme," demand rank as legitimate comedy, owing to the unmatched faculty of intimating a general purpose under the cloak of the merely ludicrous incidents which are made to surround the fortunes of a particular person. This general purpose (and here we come to the second point) is invariably a moral one. Of all dramatists, ancient and modern, Molière is perhaps that one who has borne most constantly in mind the theory that the stage is to be a pulpit, and that its end is not merely amusement, but the reformation of manners by means of amusing spectacles. . . . In brilliancy of wit he is, among modern writers, unfairly to Aristophanes and Congreve. Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 311.

Molina (mō-lē'nä), Alonso de. Born in Escalona about 1510: died at Mexico, 1585 (?). A Spanish Franciscan missionary. Montaigne (mon-tān'; F. pron. mōn-tāny'), Michel Eyquem de. Born at the Château Montaigne, Dordogne, France, Feb. 28, 1533: died Sept. 13 (?), 1592. A celebrated French essayist. His early education was carried on at home under his father's guidance. After graduating from college at Bordeaux, he studied law. In 1559 he was at the court of France, and in 1571 became attached to the person of Henry III. In 1580 Montaigne published his friend La Boetie's translations from the Greek, and in 1572 edited the latter's French verses. In 1580 he traveled in Germany, Switzerland, and Italy. He left Rome in 1581 to become mayor of Bordeaux. Montaigne is chiefly known from his "Essais" (Bordeaux, 1580: the edition of 1588 was the last to be published during the author's lifetime. Mademoiselle de Gournay, a warm admirer of Montaigne, did not have access to a copy of this last edition with the author's own corrections when she published her "Essais" (1595), with some posthumous writings and notes). An English translation was made in 1603 by the Italian Giovanni Florio, based on Mademoiselle de Gournay's book. The best classical edition of Montaigne's "Essais" is that of J. V. Leclerc: a reprint of it was made in 1865-66. In his essays Montaigne studies the men of the society of his day. He examines everything in a skeptical spirit, is inclined to doubt, and his motto is Que sais-je? Montaigne's ideas and influence are to be traced in many of the best French authors of the 17th and 18th centuries, while outside of France his essays were diligently read by Bacon and Shakspere.

Montchrestien (môñ-krā-tyoñ'), Antoine de. See the extract.

> We have seen that the early tragedy, which was more or less directly reproductive of Seneca, attained its highest pitch in the work of Garnier. This pitch was thus the well maintained by Antoine de Montchrestien, a man of a singular history and of a singular genius. The date of his birth is not exactly known, but he was the son of an apothecary at Falaise, and belonged to the Huguenot party. Duels and lawsuits succeed each other in his story, and by some means or other he was able to assume the title of seigneur de Vasteville. In one of his duels he killed his man, and had to fly to England. Being pardoned, he returned to France and took to commerce. But after the death of Henry IV. he joined a Huguenot rising, and was killed in October, 1621. Montchrestien wrote a treatise on political economy (he is even said to have been the first to introduce the term into French), some poems, and six tragedies, "Sophonisbe" or "La Carthaginoise," "Les Lacènes," "David," "Aman," "Hector," and "L'Ecossaise."

Montesino (mōn-tä-sē'nō), or Montesinos (mōn-tä-sē'nōs), Antonio. Died after 1526. A Spanish Dominican missionary. He went to Espanola in 1510; was the first to preach against Indian slavery; and in 1511 was sent to Spain to appeal against the evil. His representations resulted in the promulgation of the Laws of Burgos, later he was a friend of Las Casas, and was constantly engaged in helping the Indians. From 1521 he preached in Porto Rico, and he is known as the apostle of that island. He accompanied Ayllon's expedition to Florida in 1526.

Montesinos (mōn-tä-sē'nōs). A character in mediæval romance. Don Quixote's visit to the cave of Montesinos (book ii., chap. 23) is an important part of that romance.

Montesinos, Fernando. Born at Osuna, Seville, about 1600: died, probably in Seville, about 1655. A Spanish lawyer and historian. From 1629 to about 1650 he was in Peru, where he held important offices and made special studies of mines and of early Indian history. His principal works are "Memorias antiguas historiales del Perú" and "Anales nuevas del Perú," first published in French (1840) and in Spanish (1882). Montesinos gives a long list of the Inca and monarchs of Peru, which he professes to have received from the natives.

Montesquiou (mōn-tes-poō'), Marquise de (Françoise Athénaïs de Rochechouart), Born 1641: died at Bourbon-l'Archambault, France, May 27, 1707. A mistress of Louis XIV. She was a daughter of the Duc de Mortemart, and married the Marquise de Montespan in 1663. She succeeded Mademoiselle de la Vallière as mistress of Louis in c. about 1667, and was in turn supplanted by Madame de Maintenon three years later, although she was not wholly discarded before 1676. She eventually left the court. She had eight children by the king, including the Duc de Maine, Louis César, the Comte de Vexin, and the Comte de Toulouse. The Marquis d'Antin was her son by her husband.

Montesquieu (mōn-tes-kyé', Anglicized mon-tes-kū'), Baron de la Brède et de (Charles de Secondat). Born at the Château de la Brède, near Bordeaux, Jan. 18, 1689: died at Paris, Feb. 10, 1755. A celebrated French writer. He was brought up at the Collège of Juilly, near Meaux, and returned to his native province to study law. In 1711 he was made councilor, and in 1716 president, of the Bordeaux parliament. He was not in sympathy, however, with the duties of his position, and he gradually withdrew from them and devoted his attention to the study of literature and jurisprudence. In 1721 he won fame in the world of letters with his "Lettres persanes," in which he criticizes cleverly the French society of his time. For this work he was elected to the French Academy in 1728. The following years were spent in travel, and he visited successively Austria, Italy, Germany, Switzerland, Holland, and England. On his return to France he gave up the remainder of his life to literary work. Among his many productions, the two which have contributed most to his reputation are the "Considérations sur les causes de la grandeur et de la décadence des Romains" (1734), and "L'Esprit des lois" (1748) (which see).

Montezuma (mon-tē-zōō'mä), or Moteczuma (mō-täk-zō'mä): called Montezuma I., and surnamed Ilhuicamina (él-wē-kä-mē'na) ('archer of the heavens'). [Nahuatl, 'angry chief.'] Born at Tenochtitlan (Mexico City), 1404. War-chief and "emperor" of ancient Mexico. He was the son of Huitzilhuitl, and succeeded his brother Izcoluatl in 1436 (formally inaugurated 1440). He had wars with the Mixtecos and Tlaxcaltecas, and is said to have carried his arms to the Gulf of Mexico. Also written Motezuma (Cortes), Montezuma (Bernal Díaz and Oviedo), Motezuma (Acosta), Montezuma, Motecuhzoma, etc.

Montezuma, or Moctezuma; called Montezuma II., or Xocoyotzin (hō-kō-yōt-zēn'). Born (according to Bernal Díaz) in 1479: died at Tenochtitlan (Mexico City), June 30, 1520. An Aztec war-chief or "emperor" of Mexico at the time of the Spanish conquest. He was the son of Axayacatl, and succeeded his uncle Ahuizotl in 1503. Besides his continuous wars with the Tlascalans and Tarascans, he carried his arms far southward, and is said to have invaded Honduras; thousands of captives were brought back for sacrifice in the temples. The kings of ships and white men on the coast excited his superstitious fears. When Cortes landed he sent him presents, but tried to dissuade him from coming to Tenochtitlan. Cortes insisted, and reached the city with his army in Nov., 1519. He was well received and given rich presents, but, fearing violence from the natives, seized Montezuma in his own house, and imprisoned him in the Spanish quarters of the palace. The Aztecs at length rose in arms and attacked the quarters: Montezuma, at the request of Cortes, appeared on the wall and attempted to appease them with, it is said, but was received with a shower of stones, and died of his wounds four days later. Descendants of one of his daughters are living in Mexico. After the Spanish conquest Montezuma became a mythical personage among the Indians: this hero or hero-god they mention to strangers as their principal deity, although they do not pay him the slightest worship. In New Mexico modern travelers and tourists have thought that they have discovered a Montezuma worship, which, however, does not exist.

[It., 'iron mountain.'] A former marquisate, later a duchy, in northwestern Italy, lying south of the Po and north of the Ligurian Apennines and Alps. Capital, Casale. Its marquises from the 10th century ruled not only in Italy but for some time in Greece. A branch of the Paleeologi ruled from 1306. The marquisate was made a duchy and united to Mantua in 1536. Its possession was later a matter of dispute between Mantua and Savoy. It passed to Savoy in 1708.

Montfleury (mōn-flē-rē'), Antoine Jacob, called. Born at Paris, 1640: died at Aix, 1685. A French dramatist, son of Zacharie Jacob, also called Montfleury, an actor. His comedy "La femme juge et partie" (1669) is still played, though reduced to three acts. It was almost as successful as "Tartufe."

He wrote sixteen comedies, partly on contemporary subjects and partly adaptations of Spanish originals. The two best are "La Femme Juge et Partie" and "La Fille Capitaine." They belong to an older style of comedy than Molière's, being both extravagant and coarse, but there is considerable vis comica in them.

Montfort (mōn-fōr'), Comte Simon de. Killed near Toulouse, France, June 25, 1218. A French commander and crusader, leader of the crusade against the Albigenses in 1208. He was the father of the following.

Montfort (mont'fȯrt; F. pron. mōn-fōr'). Simon of, Earl of Leicester. Born about 1208: killed at Evesham, Aug. 4, 1265. A celebrated English general and statesman. He was the son of Simon de Montfort l'Amaury in Normandy. The earldom of Leicester came into the family through his grandmother, Amicia, daughter of Robert of Beaumont, third earl of Leicester. In 1238 Montfort married Eleanor, widow of William Marshal, earl of Pembroke, and sister of Henry III. In 1240 he went on a crusade. In 1248 he was appointed governor of Gascony. His vigorous administration resulted in an open quarrel with the king, and he resigned his office Sept. 30, 1252. The ill feeling between him and king forced Simon more and more into the popular party, and he was openly recognized as leader of the "barons' war" in 1263. On May 14, 1264, he captured the king, and became virtually governor of the kingdom. By writs in the king's name (Dec. 14 and 24, 1264) he summoned to a parliament, which met in London on Jan. 20, 120 churchmen, 23 lay barons, and 2 knights from every shire, and also 2 citizens from every borough in England: the first appearance of the commons. At this parliament the quarrel between Simon and Gilbert, earl of Gloucester, began, which ended in the death of Simon at Evesham.

Montfort, Simon of. Born near Brindisi, 1240: died near Siena, Italy, 1271. The second child of Simon of Montfort, earl of Leicester. In the "barons' war" of 1264 he defended Northampton against the king, and was captured April 5. After his father's victory at Lewes, May 14, 1265, he was made constable of Porchester. He reached Evesham after the death of his father, Aug. 4, 1265, and was obliged to surrender to Edward at Christmas. He was banished, and was still in France March 28, 1268. On March 13, 1271, he assisted in the murder of Henry of Cornwall.

Personal and literary interest both appear in a very high degree in the Memoirs of the Grande Mademoiselle. Daughter, commonly called La Grande Mademoiselle. The only daughter of Gaston of Orleans and of the Duchesse de Montpensier, she inherited enormous wealth and a position which made it difficult for her to marry any one but a crowned head. In her youth she was self-willed and by no means inclined to marriage, and prince after prince was proposed to her without success, during the time of an extraordinary part — heading armies, mounting the walls of Orleans by a scaling-ladder, and saving the united troops of Conde, after the battle of Saint-Antoine, by opening the gates of Paris to them, and causing the cannon of the Bastille to cover their flight.

Moon (mön). A heavenly body which revolves around the earth monthly, accompanying the earth as a satellite in its annual revolution, and shining by the sun's reflected light. Next to the sun, the moon is the most conspicuous and interesting of celestial objects. The rapidity of its motion, the variety of its phases, and especially the striking phenomena of its eclipses, compelled the attention of the earliest observers; and the distance and magnitude can be determined from human observations has given the theory of the moon's motion economic importance. Of all the heavenly bodies (meteors excepted), the moon is nearest to us. Its mean distance from the moon (that is, from the centers of the earth, or 238,800 miles. Its diameter is 2,162 miles (about 0.273 of the earth's equatorial diameter), and its volume is about $\frac{1}{49}$, or 0.020 of the earth. It revolves around the earth in 27d. 7h. 43m. 11.5s.; the time from new moon to new moon is 29d. 12h. 44m. 2.7s. The moon always presents nearly the same face to the earth. Moor (mōr), Karl. The principal character in Schiller's play "Die Räuber" ("The Robbers").

The hero of his first drama, the enthusiastic young robber, Moor, finds Goethe's Faust too remote to form on his own responsibility. He has all the feelings of a Werther, and, like Werther, he falls foul of society. Werther turns the destroying weapon upon himself, but Moor directs it against society. He is a rebel, like the Satan of Milton and of Klopstock, and a vagabond, like Goethe's Organtino; but, while love and reconciliation lead Organtino back to the bosom of his family, the shameful intrigues of an unnatural brother Franz turn Moor into a robber and a murderer. Hostile brothers had already been depicted by Fielding in romance, and by Lessewitz and Klinger in tragedy: the two latter had introduced fratricide upon the stage itself, and Gessner had written a patriarchal romance upon the story of Cain and Abel; but Schiller far surpasses these writers in power in the grand scene where the criminal, in fear of the avengers of his crime, pronounces and carries out his own sentence.

Scherer, History of German Literature, II. 116.

Moorcroft (mōr'krôft), William. Born in Lancashire about 1765; died in Afghanistan, Aug. 27, 1825. An English veterinary surgeon and traveler in central Asia 1819–25. His "Travels" were published in 1841.

Moore, Sir John. Born at Glasgow, Nov. 13, 1761: died at Corunna, Spain, Jan. 16, 1809. A British general. He was the eldest surviving son of Dr. John Moore, author of "Zeluco." In 1776 he became ensign of the 51st foot, and as such served against in Nova Scotia during the American Revolutionary War. He became member of Parliament for Linlithgow in 1784; and served in Corsica 1793–94, but displeased Nelson and Elliot and was ordered home. In Nov., 1797, he joined Abercromby in Ireland. He was made major-general in 1798. In Jan., 1800, he sailed for Portugal as second in command to Sir Henry Burrard, and by Sept. the entire command was left to him. He entered Spain Nov. 11, 1808; but, abandoned by the Spanish patriots, followed by the actual presence of Napoleon, was obliged to retreat 250 miles to Corunna. While the troops were embarking the French attacked them, and Moore was killed and buried in the citadel during the night of Jan. 16–17. He received a monument in St. Paul's Cathedral. The "Burial of Sir John Moore," by Rev. Charles Wolfe, is one of the most popular English poems.

Moore, Thomas. Born at Dublin, May 28, 1779: died at Bromham, near Devizes, Feb. 25, 1852. An Irish poet, son of John Moore, a grocer of Kerry. He entered Trinity College, Dublin, in 1794, where he was intimate with Robert Emmet. In 1799 he entered the Middle Temple, London, and in 1800 published his translation of "Anacreon." In 1803 and 1804 he traveled in America. In 1806 he published his "Odes and Epistles," and his "Irish Melodies" in 1807–34, receiving from them about £500 a year. His lampoons on the regent and his favorites were extremely successful, and were collected in 1813 as "The Twopenny Post Bag." On March 25, 1811, he married Bessie Dyke, an actress, and in the same year his friendship for Byron began. "Lalla Rookh," for which Longmans agreed to pay £3,000 without having seen it, was published in 1817; "National Airs" in 1815; and "Sacred Songs" in 1816. His prose works, besides the political squibs, are "Life of Sheridan" (1825), "The Epicurean" (1827), "Life of Byron" (1830), "History of Ireland," etc., besides a number of collections of humorous short papers, like "The Fudge Family in Paris," all under the pseudonym Thomas Brown the Younger. "Moore's Memoirs, Journals, and Correspondence" were published 1853–56 by Earl Russell.

Moravia (mō-rā′vi-ä). [F. Moravie, Sp. Pg. It. Moravia, NL. Moravia (G. Mähren, etc.), named from the river Morava.] A crownland of the Cisleithan division of Austria-Hungary. Capital, Brunn. It is bounded by Bohemia (partly separated by the Thaya or Dyje) on the west and northwest, Prussian Silesia and Austrian Silesia (separated by the Sudetic Mountains) on the north and northeast, Hungary (separated by the Little Carpathians) on the southeast and Hungary and Lower Austria on the south. The surface is mountainous and table-land, except in the south; it is drained largely by the March. Moravia is a great forest and agricultural country. It produces rye, barley, fruit, vegetables, etc.; has manufactures of cotton, woolen, sugar, and linen; and has mines of coal and iron. It has a Landtag of 100 members. The prevailing religion is Roman Catholic. The majority of the inhabitants are Slavs in race and language, closely allied to the Czechs, but about 30 per cent. are Germans. The early inhabitants were Germanic tribes. The region was recolonized by Slavs. Under Svatopluk it was the center of a short-lived great Slavic power, Great Moravia, which was overthrown by the Magyars in 906. Moravia passed from Hungary to Bohemia in 955, was united in 1055, and to Bohemia in 1055, and after that generally shared the fortunes of Bohemia. It became a margraviate in 1197; passed to the house of Hapsburg in 1526; was the scene of various events in the Seven Years' War and Napoleonic wars (Austerlitz, etc.); and became a crownland separate from Bohemia in 1849. Area, 8,583 square miles. Population (1890), 2,276,576.

Moravians (mō-rā′vi-anz). 1. The natives or inhabitants of Moravia (which see).—2. The members of the Christian denomination entitled the Unitas Fratrum, or United Brethren, which traces its origin to John Huss. Its members were expelled from Bohemia and Moravia in 1627, but in 1722 a remnant settled in Herrnhut, Saxony, hence the brethren are sometimes, in Germany, called Herrnhuter. The organization at present has three provinces—German, British, and American—each of which has its own government by synod) and several mission provinces. All these are represented by congressional synod which meets every bye-year at Herrnhut. The ministers are designated diaconus, presbyter, and bishop. The worship is liturgical. The doctrine is that of universal redemption, the supremacy of the Scriptures, the necessity of belief in the sufficiency of the merit of Christ's sufferings and wounds for the remission of sins, the work of the Holy Spirit, and witness of the Spirit to the soul, the second coming of Christ, and the resurrection of the dead. The Moravians are specially noted for their energy and success in missionary work.

Moray, or Morayshire. See Elgin.

Moray, Earl of. See Stuart.

Moray Firth (mur′ā firth). A large indentation of the North Sea, inclosed by the coast of Scotland from Kinnaird's Head in the northeast of Aberdeenshire to Duncansby Head in the northeast of Caithness; sometimes, in a more restricted sense, the branch of this between Elgin and Ross.

Morazan (mō-ra-thän′). Francisco. Born at Tegucigalpa, Honduras, Oct., 1792: died at San José, Costa Rica, Sept. 15, 1842. A Central American statesman and political leader. He was leader of the liberal-federalists in the revolt against the conservatives, defeated them in 1827, and became elected Honduras; by successive victories routed the conservatives on Salvador, 1828, and Guatemala, April, 1829, and on Sept., 1830, was elected president of the Central American Confederation. He governed with wisdom and liberality and was reelected in 1834, but organization was hindered by numerous revolts, and when in succession to him Aparicio (Feb. 1, 1839) there had been no reelection. Morazan made a vain attempt to keep the union, and finally, in 1839, Guatemala was supported by Salvador, but he was finally defeated by Carrera at Guatemala, March 18, 1840, and fled to Peru. In April, 1842, he invaded Costa Rica with a view to making it the basis of federal reorganization. He was at first successful, and assumed the executive of Costa Rica in July, but was deposed by a counter-revolution (Sept. 11), captured, and shot.

Morbegno (mōr-ben′yō). A town in northern Italy, on the Adda 15 miles west of Sondrio.

Mordaunt (mör′dant), Charles, third Earl of Peterborough. Born 1658: died at Lisbon, Oct. 25, 1735. An English general and admiral, son of John, Viscount Mordaunt. He matriculated at Oxford (Christ Church), April 11, 1674, and in 1675 went to the Mediterranean in the Cambridge. In 1675 he succeeded his father as Viscount Mordaunt. He interested actively in Holland and England against James II., and in the former country was intimately associated with John Locke. In 1687 he was appointed by James II. a Williamite and first lord of the treasury, and was created earl of Monmouth. Later he incurred the displeasure of the court several times, and in 1690 was arrested and was imprisoned 3 months in the Tower. On June 19, 1697, he succeeded his uncle as earl of Peterborough, and on the accession of Anne was again in favor at court. In 1705 he was appointed admiral and commander-in-chief of the fleet jointly with Sir Cloudesley Shovel, and was largely responsible for the capture of Barcelona Sept. 28. In Jan., 1708, his conduct in Spain was investigated by the House of Lords, and he was acquitted. In 1710 he was ambassador extraordinary to Vienna, and in 1711 to Frankfort. He was very eccentric, and devoted to the society of literary men, especially Swift, Pope, Arbuthnot, and Gay.

Mordecai (mōr′de-ki). [From the name of the Babylonian god Marduk or Merodach (which see).] According to the book of Esther, a Jew of the tribe of Benjamin, who lived in captivity in the time of Xerxes. He exposed a plot against the court in order to rescue the adopted daughter Esther, who had been elevated to the rank of queen, and with her help instituted the machinations of Haman (who tended to the extermination of the Jews in the Persian empire. In remembrance of this deliverance the feast of Purim is still celebrated by the Jews in the month of Adar (March-April).

Mordecai. In George Eliot's novel "Daniel Deronda," a Jew who believes himself inspired with a mission to elevate and reunite the Jewish people.

It might be said, in answer to some of these questions, that as a fact Mordecai is an ideal study from a veritable Jew, Cohn or Kohn, one of the club of students who met some forty years since at Red Lion Square, Holborn; and that recently a scheme for the redemption of Palestine for Israel was actually in contemplation among members of the Jewish race. But to criticise "Daniel Deronda" from the literal prosaic point of view, would be as much a critical stupidity as to undertake the defence of Shakspere's "King Lear" from the charge of historical improbability. Dowden, Studies in Literature, p. 298.

Mordure (mor-dūr′). Prince Arthur's enchanted sword: also called Excalibur or Caliburn.

They are largely Russianized, and comprise two main divisions, the Moksha and the Erzya. Their number is estimated at about 1,000,000.

More (mōr), Hannah. Born at Stapleton, Gloucestershire, Feb. 2, 1745; died at Clifton, Sept. 7, 1833. An English religious writer. She was educated by her father, and in 1757 joined her elder sisters in establishing a school in Bristol. In 1758 she published her Inspiration of Happiness, a poem. In 1773 and 1775 she visited London, and became intimate with Garrick and his friends, and with Richard Hurd, Dr. Johnson, and Mrs. Montagu. In 1782 she published "Sacred Dramas." After the death of Garrick, Jan. 20, 1779, her religious tendencies became stronger. In 1787 she was attracted by Wilberforce's earnest zeal for the slave-trade, and was interested in several fashionable schools among the poor as an antidote to the prevailing atheism. She wrote in 1788 "Village Politics, by Will Chip," followed by "Cheap Repository Tracts" (1795–98), one of which was "The Sufficiency of Religious Plain." Some of them were translated into Welsh and Gaelic. The encouragement which circulated them developed into the Religious Tract Depository in 1799. Her other works are "Thoughts on the Importance of the Manners of the Great to General Society" (1788), "Strictures on the Modern System of Female Education" (1799), "Coelebs in Search of a Wife" (1809), "Practical Piety, etc." (1811), "Christian Morals" (1813), etc.

He entered the New Inn, London, in 1494, and Lincoln's Inn in 1496. In 1497 he met Erasmus in England, and corresponded with him through 1518. Soon after he was absorbed in the religious studies and exercises, and thought of becoming a monk; but after 1503 he devoted himself mainly to public life. He entered Parliament in 1504. In 1508 he went to France. After his second marriage in 1511 he moved to Crosby Place, Bishopsgate Street Without. In May, 1515, he was sent as ambassador to Flanders to settle disputes with the merchants of the Netherland "Hans" were established in 1516. In 1518 he was made master of bequests by Henry VIII, and privy councilor. In June, 1520, he was with the king at the Field of the Cloth of Gold, and met Erasmus in England, and corresponded with him through 1528. In 1521 he was knighted and made subtreasurer to the king; in April, 1523, speaker of the House of Commons; and in 1525 high steward of Cambridge University. He defended the papacy against Luther, suggested the "Defensio Septem Sacramentorum" of Henry VIII, in 1521, and opposed Tindal. On Oct. 25, 1529, he succeeded Wolsey as chancellor. He opposed the bill passed by Parliament of Nov. 3, 1529, and the projected divorce of the king from Catharine, and resigned May 16, 1532. By the Act of Supremacy, May 30, 1534, an oath of adherence to the act which vested the succession in the issue of Anne Boleyn, and of renunciation of the Pope was imposed. This oath More refused to take, and he was committed to the Tower April 1, 1535. On July 1, 1535, he was tried before high treason, and was executed July 6, 1535. More was beatified by Pope Leo XII June 29, 1886. Among his English works are "Life of John Picus, Earl of Mirandula, etc.," printed in 1510 by Wynkyn de Worde (it was a translation from the Latin of Giovanni Francesco Pico, 1498). "History of Richard III" (1513), a number of controversial works, meditations, etc. Rastell, the nephew of Sir Thomas, collected most of his English works and printed them in 1557. Those of his Latin works the "Utopia" (1516; which see), Luciani Dialogi, etc." (1506), "Epigrammata, etc." (1518), number of volumes of letters by Erasmus and others, descriptions, etc. His Latin works were first collected at Basel in 1563. Morgan, William. Died 1826. A mechanic of Batavia, New York, alleged to have been abducted and killed by Freemasons for revealing secrets of the order.

Morgana (môr-gä'nä), or Morgaine (mor-gān'). [Morgana is the Breton equivalent of 'sea-woman,' from mor, sea, and gwen, splendens femina.] In Celtic legend and Arthurian romance, a fairy, sister of King Arthur. In the romance of "Ogier the Dane" she receives Ogier in the Isle of Avalon when he is over one hundred years of age, and restores him to eternal youth. She is also known as Morgan or Morgue le Fay, and in the Italian romances as Fata ('fairy') Morgana.

The fairy Morgana [Morgaine, sister of Arthur], who is a principal character in this romance ("Morte d'Arthur") and discovered to Arthur the intrigues of Genevra with Lancelot, is a leading personage not only in other tales of chivalry, but also in the Italian poems. In the Orlando Furioso she contrives the brother and the infidelity of his queen by means of a magical horn. About a fifth part of the Orlando Innamorato, beginning at canto thirty-six, is occupied with the Fata Morgana. She is there represented as dispensing all the treasures of the earth, and as inhabiting a splendid residence at the bottom of a lake. Thither Orlando penetrates, and forces her to deliver up the knights she detained in captivity, by stealing her by a lock of their hair conjuring her in the name of her master Demogorgon. She thus became a well-known character in Italy, where the appellation of Fata Morgana is given to that strange and almost incredible vision which, in certain states of the tide and weather, appears on the sea that washes the coast of Calabria. Every object at Reggio is then a thousand times reflected on a transparent vapor, or, when vapors are thick, on a species of aerial screen, elevated above the surface of the water, on which the groves and hills and towers are represented as in a moving picture.

Dunlop, Hist. of Prose Fiction, I. 186.

Morgante Maggiore (mor-gän'te mäd-jó're). [It.] A serio-burlesque romantic poem by Luigi Pulci (1485): so called from its hero, the giant Morgante. There is also a French romance, of the Carlovingian cycle, entitled "Morgant le Géant," which is probably taken from Pulci's poem.

Luigi Pulci (1431–1487), in his Morgante Maggiore, which first appeared in 1485, is alternately vulgar and burlesque, serious and insipid, or religious. The principal characters of the work are Morgante the giant who first appeared in the fabulous chronicle of Turpin, and in the romances of Adenez, in the thirteenth century. His real hero is Orlando rather than Morgante. He takes up the Paladin of Charlemagne at the moment when the intrigues of Ganelon de Mayence compel him to fly from the court. One of the first adventures of Orlando is a combat with three giants who lie close to an abbey. Two of these he kills, and makes the third, Morgante, prisoner: converts and baptizes him: and thenceforth selects him as his brother in arms, and the partaker of all his adventures.

Mormon (mor'mon), Book of. One of the authoritative writings of the Mormon Church. According to the Mormons, it is the record of certain ancient peoples in America, published by the prophet Mormon, written on golden plates, and translated by Joseph Smith at Cumorah (western New York), and translated by him. By anti-Mormons it is generally regarded as taken from a romance written about 1811 by Solomon Spaulding, whose manuscript was found by Smith and Rigdon.

Mormons (mor'monz). The adherents of a religious body in the United States, which calls itself "The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints." This denomination was founded in 1830 by Joseph Smith, a native of Sharon, Vermont. The government of the church is a hierarchy consisting of orders of priesthood, an order of Melchizedek (the higher), and an Aaronic or lesser order. The former is presided over by a president and counselors whose authority extends over the entire church, and it includes the twelve apostles, the seventies, the patriarch, the high priests, and the elders. The twelve apostles constitute the governing body, which ordains other officers and is intrusted with general ecclesiastical authority; the seventies are the missionaries and the propagandists of the body; the patriarch possesses the blessing of the church; and the high priests officiate in the offices of the church in the absence of any higher authorities; and the elders conduct meetings and superintend the priests. The Aaronic priesthood includes the bishops, the priests, the teachers, and the deacons: the two last named are the subordinate orders in the church. The duties of the bishops are largely secular. The entire territory governed by the church is divided and subdivided into districts, for the more efficient collection of tithes and the administration of the government. The Mormons accept the Bible, the Book of Mormon, and the Book of Doctrine and Covenants as authoritative, and regard the head of their church as invested with divine authority, receiving his revelations as the word of God, the Lord. They maintain the doctrines of repentance and faith, a literal resurrection of the dead, the second coming of Christ and a thousand years' reign on earth as the seat of his power in their territory, baptism by immersion, baptism for the dead, and polygamy as a sacred duty for those who are capable of entering into such marriage. The Mormons settled first at Kirtland, Ohio, then in Missouri, and, after their expulsion from these places, in Nauvoo, Illinois. In 1847–48 they removed to Utah, and have since spread into Idaho, Arizona, etc. Of late they have frequently defied the United States government. There is also a comparatively small branch of the Mormon Church, entitled "The Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints," which is opposed to polygamy and is ecclesiastically dependent on the original organization.

Morte Arthure (mort är'thėr). A compilation of prose romances on the life and death of King Arthur and the knights of the Round Table, translated from the French prose romances which had grown from the early poems by Sir Thomas Malory and printed by Caxton in 1485. It was originally called the "History" or "Book of Arthur." There is a metrical English romance with the title "Morte Arthure," said to have been written at the end of the 14th century by Huchowne (Hutchin), a Scotch ballad-writer: his authorship has been denied by Richard Morris.

Mr. Ritson imagines that the English metrical romance of Morte Arthur was versified from the prose of the same title: but, as it differs essentially from Malory's prose work, and agrees exactly with the last part of the French romance of Lancelot, it is more probable that it has been versified from this composition.

Dunlop, Hist. of Prose Fiction, I. 185.

1330. An English politician. Having been thrown into prison for complicity in the conspiracy of the Earl of Lancaster, he escaped to Paris, where in 1325 he intrigued with Isabella of France for the deposition of her husband Edward II. of England. He commanded the queen's forces in the descent on England in 1326, and after the deposition and death of the king in 1327 became with his paramour the queen, virtual ruler of the kingdom during the minority of Edward III. He was overthrown by the young king, who caused him to be condemned as a traitor by Parliament.

Mortimer his Fall. A tragedy by Ben Jonson (1640). "The argument and part of it I were alone finished. 'It was 'completed' by W. Mountfort 1731, with satirical intentions, it was supposed, towards Walpole and Queen Caroline. A new dedication was subsequently written by Wilkes in derision of Bute." Dict. Nat. Biog.

Mortimeriados. See Barons' Wars, The.

Mortimer's Cross. A place in Herefordshire, England, 15 miles north by west of Hereford. Here, Feb. 2, 1461, Edward, earl of March (Edward IV.), defeated the Lancastrians.

Mortlake (môrt'lāk). A parish in Surrey, England, on the Thames above London. The university boat-race is rowed from Putney to Mortlake.

Morton, Charles. Born in Cornwall, England, 1627: died at Charlestown, Mass., April 11, 1698. A Puritan clergyman. He was ejected from his living at Blisland, Cornwall, for nonconformity, and came to Massachusetts in July, 1686, with Samuel Penhallow. From Nov., 1686, he was minister at Charlestown, and later was vice-president of Harvard College.

Morton, George. Born at York, England, 1585: died in England about 1628. One of the Pilgrim colonists in Plymouth, Massachusetts. He emigrated to Leyden in 1612 and to Plymouth in 1623, but returned to England. He edited "Mourts Relation" (1622).

Morton, Henry. The hero of the novel "Old Mortality" by Sir Walter Scott.

Morton, Fourth Earl of (James Douglas), Born at Dalkeith, 1530; beheaded at Edinburgh, June 2, 1581. Regent of Scotland, second son of Sir George Douglas of Pittendrieh. In 1553 he succeeded to the earldom of Morton through marriage with Elizabeth, daughter of the last earl. On the accession of Queen Mary in 1561 he was made privy councilor, and in 1563 lord high chancellor. He was a prime mover in the assassination of Rizzio, and in securing the abdication of Mary at Lochleven. In Oct., 1572, he became regent on the death of the Earl of Mar. He resigned when James VI. assumed the government, and was condemned on the accusation of James Stuart (afterward earl of Arran) for complicity in the death of Darnley, the king's father.

Morton, John. Born at Milborne St. Andrew, Dorset, about 1420: died Oct. 12, 1500. An English cardinal. He was educated at Balliol college, Oxford, and practised in the Court of Arches. He was master of the rolls and bishop of Ely in the reign of Edward IV.; was imprisoned by Richard III.; and was made archbishop of Canterbury and chancellor by Henry VII. Sir Thomas More began his career as a page in Morton's house.

Morton, John Madison. Born at Pangbourne, Jan. 3, 1811: died Dec. 19, 1891. An English playwright, son of Thomas Morton (1764–1838). He was educated in Paris and Germany, and by Dr. Richardson at Clapham. He wrote "Box and Cox" (1847), and about 100 other farces.

Morton, Levi Parsons. Born at Shoreham, Vt., May 16, 1824. A banker and Republican politician, minister to France 1881–85, and Vice-President of the United States 1889–93.

Morton, Oliver Perry. Born in Wayne County, Ind., Aug. 4, 1823: died at Indianapolis, Ind., Nov. 1, 1877. An American statesman. He was governor 1861–67; United States senator (Republican) from Indiana 1867–77; and a member of the Electoral Commission (1877).

Morton, Thomas. Born at York, England, March 20, 1564: died at Easton, Northamptonshire, Sept. 22, 1659. An English clergyman, bishop of Durham (1632–44). He was a graduate of Cambridge university and professor of logic there. He was imprisoned in the Tower in 1641. He was a friend of Isaac Casaubon.

Morton, Thomas. Born in England about 1590: died at Agamenticus, Maine, about 1645. An English colonist at Mount Wollaston (Braintree, Massachusetts 1628). He was a lawyer of Clifford's Inn, and a leader of Weston's Massachusetts colony in 1622. For unpuritanical conduct he was sent back to England, but returned in 1629, and was again sent back in 1630. He published "The New English Canaan" (1632). He returned to Massachusetts in 1643, and was imprisoned for his "scandalous book."

Morton, Thomas. Born in the county of Durham, 1764: died at London, March 28, 1838. An English dramatist. He entered Lincoln's Inn, but abandoned law for play-writing. He wrote "Speed the Plough" (1798) (introducing the invisible Mrs. Grundy) the "Blind Girl" (1801), "Town and Country" (1807), "School for Grown Children" (1817), etc.

Morus. See More, Sir Thomas.

Morvan (mor-vōn'), Le. A region in the departments of Yonne and Nièvre, France. It is traversed by a chain of mountains from Avallon to Luzy (about 55 miles). Highest point, 2,976 feet.

Morven (môr'ven). A mythical Scottish kingdom referred to in the poems of Ossian.

Morvern (mor'vern). A peninsula in the northwestern part of Argyllshire, Scotland.

Mosa (mō'sä). The Latin name of the Meuse.

Mosbach (mos'bäch). A town in Baden, 21 miles east by south of Heidelberg. Population (1890), 3,459.

Mosca (mos'kä). [L., 'a fly.'] In Ben Jonson's play "Volpone, or the Fox," a parasite, in the sense of the classic drama. His pliancy and presence of mind render him invaluable to his master, Volpone, upon whom he finally turns.

His inimitable parasite, or (as the Greek and Roman authors expressed it) his Fly, his Mosca; and in this finished portrait, Jonson may throw the gauntlet to the greatest masters of antiquity: the character is of classic origin; it is found with the contemporaries of Aristophanes, though not in any comedy of his now existing; the Middle Dramatists never rose above it very frequently; and the New Comedy it rarely failed to find a place. Plautus has it again and again, but the aggregate merit of all his pure lines will not weigh the scale against this single Fly of our poet. Gifford, Notes to Jonson's "Fox," p. 299.

Moscheles (mōsh'e-les), Ignaz. Born at Prague, May 30, 1794: died at Leipsic, March 10, 1870. A noted German pianist, composer for the piano, and teacher. Among his pupils was Mendelssohn. His works include 24 etudes, "Hommage a Handel," "Concerto in G Minor," "Concerto pathetique," "Sonate melancolique," "Characteristische Studien," etc.

Moscherosch (mosh'e-rosh), Johann Michael (properly Mosenrosh). Born at Wilstädt, Alsace, March 5, 1601: died at Worms, April 4, 1669. A German author. He wrote an allegorico-satirical work, "Philander von Sittewald" (1643), etc.

Moschi (mos'ki). [Gr. Μόσχοι.] In ancient geography, a people in Asia, living southeast of the Euxine, near Armenia: probably the same as Meshech in the Old Testament. They are mentioned in the cuneiform inscriptions as Muski (which see).

Moschus (mos'kus). [Gr. Μόσχος.] Lived about 200 B. C. A Greek bucolic poet of Syracuse.

Moscoso (mos-kō'sō), Luis de, or Escobedo de Alvarado (mos-kō'sō dā ā-kwā-rā'thō), Luis. Born at Badajoz about 1505: died about 1560. A Spanish soldier. He followed his kinsman, Pedro de Alvarado, to Guatemala (1529) and Peru (1534). Subsequently he united with Fernando de Soto in his expedition to Florida (1538), and after the death of that leader near the Mississippi River (May 21, 1542), succeeded him in command. In July, 1543, he descended the Mississippi, arriving safely at the Gulf of Mexico, and sent to the viceroy Mendoza, and in 1551 accompanied him to Peru. Also written Moscoso de Mososo.

Moscow (mos'kou). [F. Moscou, G. Moskau, Russ. Moskva, Russ. Moskva, named from the river Moskva.] 1. A government of central Russia, surrounded by the governments of Tver, Vladimir, Ryazan, Tula, Kaluga, and Smolensk. The surface is level and undulating. It is the leading manufacturing province of Russia. Area, 12,589 square miles. Population (1890), 1,936,000.

2. The capital of Moscow government, on the Moskva in lat. 55° 45′ N., long. 37° 34′ E. It is the second capital of the empire, the place of coronation, and the seat of the metropolitan; the chief commercial and railway center of Russia, with important domestic, European, and Asiatic trade; and the chief manufacturing city, having important woolen, cotton, silk, and leather goods. It has the chief factories on the Kreml (in the center), Kitai-Gorod (trading quarter), Byelol-Gorod, and Zemlyanoi-Gorod. Among the buildings (besides those of the Kremlin, which see) are many churches. The Cathedral of the Annunciation, within the Kremlin, has been several times rebuilt, the last time after a fire in 1547. The plan is rectangular, with 3 shallow apses, piercing angles-polygonal, and a Byzantine architecture. The interior is frescoed, and is paved with jasper and agate: the iconostasis and treasury are rich with imperial and princely gifts. Archangel's is the usual place of baptism and marriage of the czars. The Cathedral of the Assumption, within the Kremlin, the church in which the czar is crowned, was founded in 1326, and rebuilt in the 15th century. The size is small, but as an example of the old Russian style, and for the gorgeous magnificence of the interior, there is no more interesting building in Russia. The plan is rectangular, with a deep triple apse containing the bema and parabemata, and flanked by chapels. The domes are supported by 4 great cylindrical pillars and by 12 pairs of columns, the arches on which are painted: the walls also are resplendent with gold. The ornaments on the iconostasis, together with the church plate, amount to very many tons of gold. The icons of the iconostasis and many of the shrines and offerings in the treasury are not only old, but inherently of high artistic value. The Cathedral of the Archangel Michael, within the Kremlin, was founded 1333, but rebuilt in 1509. It is rectangular, with 5 gilded domes, the central one, which is much the largest, of bulbous form. In this church are the tombs of the Ruriks and Romanofs from the days of its founding to Peter the Great, including that of Ivan the Terrible. The iconostasis and the treasury are remarkably rich. The Cathedral of St. Basil the Beatified, begun in 1556, is one of the most fantastic architectural creations in existence, though it was built by an Italian architect, who applied in it, in mean combination, the principles of the old Russo-Byzantine rubble. From a general outline to personified, there are 11 bulbous domes raised on high drums, all different in surface ornament and in color. The brilliant group of domes and spires is supplied by several projecting porches, differing in form, and with high, pyramidal roofs. One of these is circularly arcaded, and forms a belfry. The temple of the Saviour, built and ornamented in commemoration of the 1,500 years of Christ's birth, was begun in 1839, and finished in 1883. Its plan is that of a Greek cross, with colossal dome in the center, and the four arms of the cross terminating in semicircular apses. Each apse is surrounded by a colonnade, and in every arch a bell is suspended. One of the bells weighed 64 tons. The height is 325 feet to the top of the cross. Other buildings of interest are the Theater, Foundling Hall, that of the Nobility, and founding hospital. The university, founded in 1755, has a library of 170,000 volumes, and the museum has a library of 200,000 volumes. The city was founded in the middle of the 12th century. The principality of Moscow was united with that of Vladimir, and Moscow became the capital of the grand principality of Moscow (see below) and part of the metropolitan in the first part of the 14th century. It was taken and burned by Lithuanians and Tatars in the 14th century, nearly destroyed by fire in 1547, and burned by Khan Devlet in 1571. The capital was removed to St. Petersburg by Peter the Great. Moscow was burned by its inhabitants during its occupation by the French in Sept., 1812. Population (1888), 598,742.

Moscow, Grand Principality of, or Muscovy (mus'kō-vi). A grand principality which grew up around Moscow, and developed into the Russian empire. It was founded by Daniel, son of Alexander Nevski, about 1300, and was independent in 1328, and his successor Simeon took the title of grand prince of all the Russias. Vasili (1389–1425), grand prince of Moscow and Vladimir, became prince of Suzdal, and further extended his territories. The work of consolidation was greatly advanced under Ivan III., who annexed Perm (1472), Novgorod (1478), Tver (1485), Vyatka (1489), etc. He freed Moscow from tribute to the Mongols, and by conquests from Lithuania carried the western border to the Desna and then to the Soja. For further history see Russia.

Mosè in Egitto (mō-zā' ēn ā-jē'tō). [It., 'Moses in Egypt.'] An opera by Rossini, produced at Naples in 1818, and at Paris in 1822. It was again produced at Paris in 1827, somewhat modified, as "Moise," and called in "Guillaume Tell." In 1833 it was produced at London as "Pietro l'Eremita"; and in 1833 as an oratorio, entitled "The Israelites in Egypt, etc.," with additions from "Israel in Egypt."

Moseley (mōz'li), Henry. Born at Newcastle-under-Lyme, July 9, 1801: died at Olveston, Gloucestershire, Jan. 29, 1872. An English scientific writer. He studied at Cambridge, and was professor of natural philosophy and astronomy at King's College, London, 1831–44. He wrote "Lectures on Astronomy" (1839), "Mechanical Principles of Engineering and Architecture" (1843), etc.

Moseley, Henry Nottidge. Born at Wandsworth, 1844: died at Clevedon, Somerset, Nov. 10, 1891. An English naturalist: son of Henry Moseley. He was one of the naturalists on the Challenger expedition 1872–76, and became Linacre professor of anatomy at Oxford in 1884.

Moselle (mō-zel'). [F. Mosel (mō'zel). A river in France, Alsace-Lorraine, and Prussia: the Roman Mosella. It rises in the Vosges, and joins the Rhine at Coblenz. Among its tributaries are the Meurthe and the Sarre. The valley is noted for its wines. Length, 335 miles; navigable for 264 miles.

Moselle. A former department of France. It was ceded in large part to Germany as part of Alsace-Lorraine in 1871. The remainder forms part of the French department of Meurthe-et-Moselle.

Mosen (mō'zen), Julius. Born at Marienev, Saxony, July 8, 1803: died in Oldenburg, Oct. 10, 1867. A German poet, dramatist, and novelist. His works include the poems "Ahasver im Ritter Wahn" (1839), "Ahasver" (1888), "Poems" (including "Andreas Hofer, Tragödie"), "Gedichte," "Die Pfarrerin von Florence," "Bernhard von Weimar" (1853), etc.

Mosenthal (mō'zen-tāl), Salomon Hermann von. Born at Cassel, Prussia, Jan. 14, 1821: died at Vienna, Feb. 17, 1877. A German dramatist. Among his plays are "Deborah," "Leah," "Der Sonnenwendhof" (1856), "Dawake" (1860), "Pietro Cano," etc.

Moser (mō'zer), Johann Jakob. Born at Stuttgart, Würtemberg, Jan. 18, 1701: died at Stuttgart, Sept. 30, 1785. A noted German jurist and publicist, author of "Deutsches Staatsrecht" (1737–54), etc.

Möser (mē'zer), Justus. Born at Osnabrück, Prussia, Dec. 14, 1720: died there, Jan. 8, 1794. A German historian, critic, and miscellaneous author. He wrote "Patriotische Phantasien" (1774–86), a history of Osnabrück (1768), etc.

Moses (mō'zez). [ME. Moyses, LL. Moyses, Moses, etc., Gr. Μωσῆς, Μωϋσῆς, explained as 'drawn from the water.'] In Old Testament history, the lawgiver of the Israelites and organizer of the Israelitish nation. After his birth his mother kept him concealed three months to evade the command of the king of Egypt that all male Hebrew children be drowned in the Nile. He was then exposed in a box among the rushes on the banks of the Nile, and was found by an Egyptian princess who adopted and reared him. After he had grown up, he one day struck an Egyptian whom he saw cruelly beating a Hebrew slave. Fearing punishment, he fled from Egypt into the desert, and halted at an oasis inhabited by the Kenites. Here he married Zipporah, the daughter of Reuel, the priest of Midian, and tended the flocks of his father-in-law. It was here that the prophetic spirit came upon him, and he decided to return to Egypt for the purpose of delivering his brethren from slavery. On his return his brother Aaron joined in his plans. His first efforts in their behalf only resulted in the infliction of more severe burdens and greater cruelty. Presently, however, a series of most disastrous plagues afflicted the inhabitants of Egypt, and the king finally concluded that these had been brought upon the land by the unknown God whose name Moses had invoked. He accordingly ordered the Israelites to leave at once, and they began their departure on the 15th of Nisan (March-April), an event which is known as the Exodus. Moses was the leader of the Israelites during their 40 years' journeyings in the wilderness, which period he utilized for perfecting a civil organization and for the preparation of a code of laws of a high ethical, religious, sanitary, and political character. Jewish tradition ascribes to him the authorship of the Pentateuch with the exception of the verses describing his death. This tradition has been generally accepted by the Christian and Mohammedan world. Of late biblical critics have denied the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch. With few exceptions, however, they consider Moses as a historical character and as the organizer of the Hebrew nation.

Amongst all lawgivers, founders of states, and teachers of mankind, none has equalled Moses. Not only did he, under the most manifold circumstances, transform a horde of slaves into a nation, but he imparted on it the seal of everlasting existence: he breathed into the national body an immortal soul. He held before his people ideals the acceptance of which was indispensable to raise their weal and woe depended upon the realisation or non-realisation of those ideals. Moses could well declare that he had carried the people as a father carries his child. His patience and his courage had rarely deserted him; his unselfishness and his meekness of disposition were two prominent qualities which, together with his clear, prophetic vision, enabled him to be the great leader and lawgiver of the Deity. Free from jealousy, he wished that all Israelites might be prophets like himself, and that God would endue them with His spirit. Moses lived at a subsequent epoch the unattainable ideal of a prophet.

Graetz, History of the Jews (Amer. ed.), I. 30.

Moses. 1. A Jew money-lender in Sheridan's "School for Scandal."—2. See Primrose.

Moses. An oratorio by A. B. Marx (both words and music), performed at Breslau in 1841. The book was originally compiled by Mendelssohn at Marx's request, though afterward rejected. Grove.

Moses. A famous statue by Michelangelo, in San Pietro in Vincoli, Rome. The figure is gigantic and colossal. The right hand upholds the Tables of the Law and clutches the long beard. The left arm, pressed close to the body, marks the effort with which the righteous outbreak against the idolatrous is restrained.

Moses ben Nachman (mō'zez ben näch'män); called, after the initials of his name, Bonastruc. Born 1200; died 1272. A Jewish scholar and writer of Gerona, northern Spain. He wrote a commentary on the Pentateuch, and many Talmudical treatises, and also several poems. His writings exhibit the clear and erudite thinker, but also his dedication to mysticism. In 1263 King James I. of Aragon, at the instigation of the Dominican superior Raymundo de Penaforte, ordered Moses to engage in a religious disputation with the Dominican Fra Pablo. Soon afterward Moses emigrated to Palestine, where he remained until the end of his life.

Moses of Khorni. Lived in the 5th century. An Armenian scholar, the reputed author of a "History of Armenia" (probably written in the 7th century).

Moses Striking the Rock. A painting by Nicolas Poussin (1649), in the Hermitage Museum, St. Petersburg. Moses, toward one side, smites the rock, from which an abundant stream gushes. Aaron and his sons, giving thanks, overlook the group. From the other side suffering men and women rush toward the welcome water.

Mosenas (mō-sā-tā'näs). An Indian tribe of Bolivia, on the upper Beni, and between that river and the Manoré. They are light-colored, and are remarkable for the prevalence among them of a disease (found also in other tribes) which causes the skin to turn in white patches; but is not otherwise baneless. The Mosetenas are a mild race, and have been partly Christianized; they are reduced to a few thousands. Their language, that of some small allied tribes, appears to indicate a distinct stock. This is one of the tribes improperly called Chunchos by the Bolivians. Also written Moxtenas.

Moshaisk. See Mozhaisk.

Mosheim (mōs'hīm), Johann Lorenz von. Born at Lübeck, Oct. 9, 1694; died at Göttingen, Sept. 9, 1755. A distinguished German Protestant ecclesiastical historian, theologian, and pulpit orator. He became professor of theology at Helmstedt in 1723, abbot at Marienthal and Michaelstein in 1726, and professor at Göttingen in 1747. His chief work is "Institutiones historiæ ecclesiasticæ" ("Institutes of Ecclesiastical History," 1726; new ed. 1755). He also wrote "De rebus Christianorum ante Constantinum commentarii" (1753).

Moskva (mosk-vä'). A river in the government of Moscow, Russia. It joins the Oka near Kolomna. Length, about 300 miles; navigable to Moscow. For the battle on it, Sept. 7, 1812, see Borodino.

Moslems (mos'lemz). [Turk. and Ar. *muslim*an, professors of submission (islam) to the faith.] The followers of Mohammed; the orthodox Mohammedans.

Mosque of Omar. See Omar, Mosque of.

Mosquera (mōs-kä'rä). Tomas Cipriano. Born at Popayan, Sept. 20, 1798; died at Coconuco, Oct. 7, 1878. A Colombian general and politician. He held high civil and military offices under Bolivar and his successors, and was president of New Granada during a prosperous term (1845–49). He headed the federalist-democratic revolt of 1859–61; assumed the supreme power July, 1861; and called a constituent assembly, which created the United States of Colombia and made him dictator. Continued civil wars forced him to resign his power into the hands of a new assembly, which limited the presidential term to 2 years and forbade reelection. Under this constitution he was president 1862–64, and was again elected in 1866. Assuming dictatorial powers, he was deposed by a revolution, May, 1867, and banished for 3 years. Subsequently he was governor of Cauca and a member of Congress. He published in 1853 a biography of Bolivar and a work on the geography of New Granada.

Mosquitia (mōs-kē-tē'ä), or Mosquito (mos-kē'tō) Coast. The region occupied by the Mosquitos. At present the name is restricted to a strip on the east coast of Nicaragua, from lat. 10°30′ N. northward, comprising probably less than 7,000 square miles. The English settled here about 1660, and their rights were recognized by Spain in 1670. Great Britain recognized the Mosquito king and established a protectorate over the country; but endless quarrels with Spain resulted in the cession of the British rights in exchange for Belize, to which the colonists were transferred (1786). The Spaniards were driven out by the natives; later Great Britain resumed a nominal protectorate, which led to quarrels with Nicaragua (1840–48). By the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, signed at Washington April 19, 1850, and by a subsequent treaty with Honduras, Great Britain resigned all claim to Mosquitia. The country is now (1894) claimed by Nicaragua, but the Mosquitos obey their own king. They are essentially in a savage condition.

Mosquito Coast. See Mosquitia.

Mosquito Reservation. The southern part of the Mosquito Coast, reserved for the Mosquitos, and nominally belonging to Nicaragua.

Mosquitos (mōs-kē'tōs). The name given by the Spaniards to a race of mixed African and Indian blood, on the eastern coast of Nicaragua and Honduras. They call themselves Miskitos, and are probably descended from Simarrones, or fugitive slaves and native women; their language is said to be partly made up of African words. The Mosquitos first became prominent in the latter part of the 17th century, when their coast was visited by buccaneers. At that time they were a powerful and warlike race, using bows, lances, and clubs in battle, and capable, it is said, of mustering 40,000 warriors. They were governed by a king or kings. At present (1894) the Mosquitos probably number less than 10,000. See Mosquitia.

Moss (mos). A town in the province of Smaalenene, Norway, situated on Christiania Fiord 35 miles south of Christiania. The Convention of Moss, Aug. 14, 1814, ended the war between Sweden and Denmark. Population (1891), 8,030.

Mosses from an Old Manse. A collection of stories by Nathaniel Hawthorne, published in 1846, after having appeared separately elsewhere.

Mossicrch. See Messkirch.

Mossley (mos'li). A manufacturing town in Lancashire, England, 9 miles east-northeast of Manchester. Population (1891), 14,162.

Mossop (mos'op). Henry. Born in 1729; died at Chelsea, Dec. 27, 1774. An Irish actor, son of the rector of Tuam. He made his first appearance on the stage Nov. 29, 1746, as Zanger in Young's tragedy "Revenge" at Dublin. He first appeared in England Sept. 26, 1751, as Richard III., in which he was received with great enthusiasm. In 1759 he appeared in England for the last time, returning to Dublin as a star. He played under the management of Barry for the season, but the next year he undertook the management of a rival theater, which ended in the financial ruin of both. Mossop died in great poverty.

Mostaganem (mos-tä-gä-nem'). A seaport in the province of Oran, Algeria, situated near the Mediterranean 43 miles east-northeast of Oran. Population (1891), 13,895.

Mostar (mos-tär'). The capital of Herzegovina, situated on the Narenta about lat. 43° 22′ N., long. 17° 52′ E. It is the seat of a Greek and of a Roman Catholic bishopric. A Roman bridge across the Narenta, ascribed to Trajan, is a single splendid arch, 89 feet in span and 56 above the water. Population (1885), 12,065.

Most Christian Doctor. A surname given to Gerson, and also to Cusanus.

Most Christian King. A title conferred on various French kings, particularly Louis XI.

Most Learned of the Romans, The. Varro.

Mosul (mō'sōl). 1. A vilayet of Asiatic Turkey, in the Tigris valley. Area, 29,220 square miles. Population, 300,280.—2. A city in Mesopotamia, the chief town of the vilayet of Mosul, situated on the right bank of the Tigris, opposite the site of ancient Nineveh. It is the seat of a pasha, and is famous for the manufacture of the delicate cotton tissue called muslin or mousseline, to which it gave its name.

Motagua (mō-tä'gwä), or Rio Grande. A river of Guatemala. It flows into the Bay of Honduras. Length, about 250 miles.

Motala (mō-tä'lä). A small town in southern Sweden, on the eastern shore of Lake Vettern.

Motanebbi (mō-tä-neb'bē), or Motenebbi (mō-te-neb'bē). Born at Cufa about 915; killed near Shiraz by robbers, 965. An Arabian poet.

Mota Padilla (mō'tä pä-dēl'yä), Matias de la. Born at Guadalajara, Oct. 6, 1688; died in July, 1766. A Mexican historian. He was a lawyer, and during his last years a priest. His "Historia de la conquista de la Nueva Galicia," printed at Mexico 1870–71, is a work of great value.

Moth (moth). 1. A fairy in Shakspere's "Midsummer Night's Dream." This character was very early excised from the text of the play, though retained in the dramatis personæ. Fleay.

2. A page in Shakspere's "Love's Labour 's Lost."—3. In Cartwright's play "The Ordinary," a shallow-brained antiquary, whose conversation is mostly disjointed scraps from Chaucer.

Mother Ann, or Mother Lee. See Lee, Ann.

Mother Bunch. See Bunch, Mother.

Mother Goose. A name famous in nursery literature through the familiar jingles called "Mother Goose's Melodies." It is said that there was a Mrs Goose, mother-in-law of Thomas Fleet, an early Boston (Mass.) publisher, and that he issued the collection under this title to avenge himself for her persistent and unmelodious chanting of the words to infant son. The earliest known edition bears the title "Songs for the Nursery, or Mother Goose's Melodies for Children: printed by T. Fleet at his printing house, Pudding Lane, 1719, price, two coppers." This, however, has been discredited by Mr. W. Wells Newell, who says Perrault published "Contes de ma mere l'oye" in 1697; but the name was quoted by the satirist Regnier more than a century before. Queen Goose-foot (Reine Pédauque), or Bertha with the great foot or goose-foot, appears as synonymous with Mother Goose in French tales. The second day of the year is her festival, and is kept as a children's holiday. (See Bertha or Berthrada.) The "Contes de ma mère l'oye," by Charles Perrault, were published under the name of his infant son, Pierault d'Armancourt. They consist of ten stories, seven of which are evidently derived from the "Pentamerone," an earlier Italian collection. Charles Dibdin wrote a pantomime called "Mother Goose."

Mother Hubberd's Tale. A poem by Spenser, published in 1591 in a volume known as "Complaints," but written much earlier. It is an imitational imitation of Chaucer's manner. It was also entitled "Prosopopeia."

Motley (mot'li). John Lothrop. Born at Dorchester (now part of Boston), Mass., April 15, 1814; died in Dorset, England, May 29, 1877.

An American historian and diplomatist. He graduated at Harvard in 1831, and, after completing his general education at Gottingen and Berlin and spending some time in travel, returned to America in 1834, took up the study of law, and was admitted to the bar. He eventually devoted himself to the study of history, and lived mostly abroad, residing in England after 1868. He was United States minister to Austria 1861-67, and to Great Britain 1869-70. His chief works are "Rise of the Dutch Republic" (3 vols. 1856), "History of the United Netherlands" (4 vols. 1860-68), and "Life and Death of John of Barneveld" (1874).

Motolinia (mō-tō-lē-nē'ä), Toribio de. Born at Benavente, Zamora, about 1500: died at Mexico, Aug. 9, 1568. A Spanish Franciscan missionary and author. His real name appears to have been Paredes, and he was known as Toribio de Benavente; he adopted the name Motolinia from an Indian word meaning 'poor.' He went with the first Franciscans to Mexico (1524), and was one of the most successful missionaries. Most of his numerous writings are lost; the most important remaining is the "Historia de los Indios de la Nueva España," published in the Kingsborough collection, and later (1859) by Icazbalceta. It is reported that the provincial library at Toledo has a copy of his "Doctrina Cristiana en lingua Mexicana" (Mexico, 1539), but this is probably a mistake: it would be the oldest known book published in America. Moyen de Parvenir (mwa-yan' de par-ve-nēr'). [F., "how to succeed."] See the extract.

Much later (1610) the last of many almost he said the first echo of the gnomic spirit of Rabelais was sounded in the "Moyen de Parvenir" of Beroalde de Verville. This eccentric work is perhaps the most perfect example of a farrago in existence. In the guise of a medley of the author brings in many celebrated persons of the day and of antiquity, and makes them talk from pillar to post in the strangest possible fashion. The heterogeneity of language and anecdote which Rabelais had permitted himself to equalled and exceeded, but many of the tales are told with consummate art, and in the midst of the ribaldry and buffoonery touches of no small shrewdness are constantly dropped as if by accident. Smeathary, French Lit., p. 193.

Moys (moi'ès). A village near Görlitz, Silesia, Prussia. Here, Sept. 7, 1757, the Austrians under Nadasti defeated the Prussians under Winterfeld.

Moytura. See the extract.

Many battles took place between these Danaans and the earlier Firbolgic settlers. The native cairns, dolmens, and the Ard-Ri-Bhaile themselves, of the country. One of the best substantiated of these, not, indeed, by history or even tradition, but by a more solid testimony, that of the stone remains left on the spot, prove, at any rate, that some long-sustained battle was at some remote period fought on the spot [sic]. Thus the famous pre-historic battle of Moytura, rather the Southern Moytura, for there were two, the other, situated not far from the present town of Sligo, retaining "the largest collection of pre-historic remains," says Dr. Petrie, "in any region of the world with the exception of Carnac." This second battle of Moytura was fought upon the plain of Conig, which is washed by the waters of Lough Mask and Lough Corrib, close to where the long monotonous, undulating hills of Ireland become broken, changes into that region of high mountains and lovely valleys now called Connemara, but which in earlier days was always known as Iar Connaught. Lawless, Story of Ireland, p. 7.

Mozart (mō'zärt; G. pron. mō'tsärt), Leopold. Born at Augsburg, Bavaria, Nov. 14, 1719; died at Salzburg, May 28, 1787. A German violinist and musical writer.

Mozart, Wolfgang Amadeus. Born at Salzburg, Austria, Jan. 27, 1756; died at Vienna, Dec. 5, 1791. A celebrated Austrian composer, son of Leopold Mozart. He showed a precocious knowledge of music when only three years old, and first appeared in public in a performance at the University of Salzburg, in 1761, when between five and six years of age. In 1762 his father took him with his sister Marianne on a concert tour to Munich, Vienna, and other places, and in the next year to Paris, where they, especially Wolfgang, excited great enthusiasm. At London in the winter they were equally successful, and remained in England till Aug., 1765. Mozart during this time composed a number of symphonies, sonatas, and the overture to Ipermestra. At concerts: they also played at their lodgings for such as chose to test their genius in private. They finally arrived at Salzburg again in Nov., 1766, and in 1767 went to Vienna, at court in Vienna, where Mozart was urged by the emperor to compose an opera and conduct it. He took the story of "La finta semplice," and his opera, though opposed by the envy of other musicians, was finally performed at Salzburg. He succeeded in producing his "Bastien und Bastienne" in a private theater at Vienna, and he also composed a cantata for the music at the ceremonies at the consecration of the new church at Waisenhaus. From 1769 to 1771 they traveled in Italy, Mozart winning fresh laurels. In 1777 he went to Paris with his mother; where he found that the admiration accorded to a precocious child was not so easily obtained by a mature musician. After the death of his mother he returned to Salzburg, and in 1781 to Vienna, where he lived with the archbishop. He reaped but little pecuniary benefit from his compositions, and his health began to fail. In 1740 he wrote his three celebrated symphonies and the "Magic Flute," and in this year received the famous commission from a mysterious stranger afterward known to be the steward of Count Walsegg) to write a requiem mass to be finished within a month. His enfeebled health and various circumstances connected with the commission produced a serious effect on his already troubled brain, and he intimated it to be a summons from the other world. He began the mass, however, and said that it was for his own funeral. As he was dictating, he was not able to supervise the performance of the finished part. He died of malignant typhus fever. There were no ceremonies at his grave, and even his friends followed him no farther than the city gates, owing to a violent storm. He was buried in the common ground of St. Marx, and the exact position of his grave is not known. Many years after a monument was erected to him by the city of Vienna. He left over six hundred compositions, which include more than forty symphonies, a number of masses (mostly composed in his youth), sonatas, quartets, "Die Requiem," or Amadeus his operas are: "Idomeneo" (1781), "Mithridate," "La finta Giardiniera," "Zaide," "Die Entführung aus dem serail" (1782), "Le Nozze di Figaro" ("The Marriage of Figaro," 1786), "Don Giovanni" (1787), "Così fan tutte" (1790), "La Clemenza di Tito" (1791), "Die Zauberflöte" ("The Magic Flute," 1791), etc. Very little of his music was published in his lifetime.

Semi-civilized and corrupted by prolonged contact with the whites, they are dying out. Their language will remain, since it is adopted by the inland natives to press to the coast. The Mpongwe are divided into four social classes: (a) the Mpongwe of pure blood; (b) those descended from an alien mother; (c) those born of slave women; and (d) slaves.

Mrichchhakatika (mrch-ch-ha-ka'ti-kā). [Skt. mrid, clay, and shakatikā, a small cart.] "The Little Clay Cart," a Sanskrit drama. It is a work of remarkable comparatively to the best modern comedies in plot, incident, character delineation, and felicity of diction, and extraordinary in its minute directions to the actors as to playing scenic artifices. It has been supposed to have been written in the 1st or 2d century, but Von Schroder puts it in the 5th or 6th. Its authorship is ascribed in flattery to a king Shudraka, who is praised in the prologue. Pischel, after assigning it to Bhasa, believes its real author to have been Dandin. The hero is Charudatta, a virtuous Brahman, reduced to poverty by his generosity; the heroine, Vasantasena, a beautiful and wealthy hetaira, who loves him and repulses the king's brother-in-law, Samsthanaka. Vasantasena is purified and ennobled by her affection, and at last weds Charudatta. "The little clay cart" or "toy cart," from which the name comes, is a plaything of the little son of Charudatta. Visiting Charudatta at his house, Vasantasena finds his child crying because his toy cart is of clay while that of a neighbor's child is of gold. Vasantasena fills the boy's cart with her jewels, and tells him to have a gold cart made from them. The Mrichchhakatika has been translated into English by Wilson, into German by both Bohtlingk and Fritze, into French by Regnaud, into Danish by Brandes, and into Russian by Kossovitsch. A full account of the play is given in Von Schroder's "Indien's Literatur und Cultur: Vorlesung 43."

Much Ado about Nothing. A comedy by Shakspere, produced in 1597–98. It was first printed in 1600. The play was known as "Benedict and Bettis" in 1613, and is probably the same as "Love's Labour's Won" (which see). The story of Hero is taken with some variations from one of Bandello's tales, which probably was borrowed from that of Ginevra and Ariodante in the "Orlando Furioso" of Ariosto. This part of the play, however, is subordinated by Shakspere to the loves of Benedick and Beatrice.

Mulberries, The. See the extract.

> Towards the end of the year 1824, some young men met at a humble tavern, the Wrekin, in the genial neighbourhood of Covent Garden, with Shakspeare as their common idol; and it was a regulation of this club that some paper, or paper, or essay bearing upon Shakspeare should be contributed by each. Hither came Douglas Jerrold, and he was soon joined by Laman Blanchard. . . . Upon Jerrold's suggestion the club was called the Mulberries, and their contributions Mulberry leaves. . . . The club did not, however, die easily; it was changed and genteel in times nearer the present, when it was called the Shakspeare Club. Charles Dickens, Mr. Justice Talfourd, Daniel Maclise, Mr. Macready, Mr. Frank Stone, etc., belonged to it. Respectability killed it.

Muses (mū'zez). [Gr. Moῦσαι.] In Greek mythology, the daughters of Zeus and Mnemosyne, who according to the earliest writers were goddesses of memory, then inspiring goddesses of song, and according to later ideas divinities presiding over the different kinds of poetry, and over the sciences and arts, while at the same time having as their especial province springs and limpid streams. Their number appears in the Homeric poems not to be fixed; later it seems to have been put at three, but afterward they were spoken of as nine: Clio, the muse of epic epoch, or of history; Euterpe, of Dionysiac music and the double flute; Thalia, of gaiety, pastoral life, and comedy; Melpomene, of song and harmony, and of tragedy; Terpsichore, of choral dance and song; Erato, of erotic poetry and the lyre; Polymnia or Polyhymnia, of the inspired and stately hymn; Urania, of astronomical and other celestial phenomena; and Calliope, the chief of the Muses, of poetic inspiration, of epic diction and of heroic or epic poetry. The Muses were intimately associated in legend and in art with Apollo, who, as the chief guardian and leader of their company, was called Musagetes.

Muses' Looking-Glass, The. A play by T. Randolph, originally acted under the title of "The Entertainment." It was printed in 1638. Of the date of the piece there can be no doubt, for the device of draining the Fens by Dutch windmills, in 1632, is alluded to as contemporary. Fleay.

Museum (mū-zē' um). [Gr. Μουσεῖον, from Μοῦσα, Muse.] 1. A hill almost directly south of the Acropolis at Athens, the furthest east of the group of hills on the southwestern side of the city: named from the existence on it of an old shrine of the Muses. On its summit stands a conspicuous monument, ornamented with niches, Corinthian columns, statues, and a relief-frieze, to Philoppapus, the last king of Commagene, who became an Athenian citizen after his dethronement by Vespasian. The slopes of the hill, particularly on its southern extension, abound with curious rock-cuttings, for the most part vestiges of prehistoric Athens. These include house foundations, stairs, meeting-places with seats, and the so-called prison of Socrates and fountain of Lycon. Between this hill and the Pnyx passed the road to the Piræus between the Long Walls. The rock is deeply cut with the ruts of chariot-wheels and an artificial water-channel.

2. An institution of learning in ancient Alexandria. See the extract.

> King Ptolemy I., surnamed Sôter, 'the Preserver' (306–285 B. C.), founded the Museum, or Temple of the Muses, which was somewhat like a modern university. The building included galleries of art, lecture-rooms, and dining-halls. Distinguished men of learning were maintained in the Museum; and the beautiful gardens, with their shady walks, their statues and fountains, became famous as the haunt of Alexandrian poets and scholars.

Musgu (mōs'gō). See Masa.

Musidora (mū-si-dō'rā). The coy sweetheart of Damon in Thomson's "Seasons." His delicacy on the occasion of seeing her bathing won her affections. She is the subject of a painting by Gainsborough, in the National Gallery, London. The naiad, lightly draped, sits on the bank of a woodland stream: one foot is already in the water, and she is removing the sandal from the other.

Muskegon (mus-kē'gon). A city, capital of Muskegon County, Michigan, situated on Muskegon Lake, near Lake Michigan, in lat. 43° 15′ N., long. 86° 13′ W. The leading industry is the lumber manufacture and trade. Population (1890), 22,702.

Muskhogean (musk-hō'gē-an). An important linguistic stock of North American Indians, named from the Muskhogee of the Creek confederacy. Its divisions occupied nearly the whole State of Mississippi, the western half of Tennessee, a small area in eastern Kentucky, all of Alabama, most of Georgia, and, in late times, nearly all of Florida. The following is a linguistic classification of the tribes: (a) The western group (the main people, the Choctaw, branched out into the Chicasa, the Choctaw Gulf tribes (e. g. Pascagoula) in the State of Mississippi, and a few in lower Louisiana and Alabama). (b) The Alibamu group (Alibamu villages, Muklasa, Oshinipofa, Koassati, Oktchoyi: all near the junction of Coosa and Tallapoosa rivers, Alabama). (c) The central or Creek group (Upper Creeks, on the Coosa and Tallapoosa rivers and in the central district between the two; the Creek portion of the Seminoles, Yamasi, and Yamacraw; Lower Creeks, on middle Chattahoochee River and east of it). (d) The Hitchiti group (the tribes speaking Hitchiti dialects on lower Chattahoochee River and west of it, as Hitchiti, Sawokli, Oconi, Ochlosi, Tutalosi, and the Hitchiti portion of the Seminoles and of the Yamasi and Yamacraw). (e) The Apalachi group (formerly near St. Mark's River, Florida). The principal tribes are the Alibamu, Apalachi, Chicasa, Choctaw, Creek or Maskoki proper, Hitchiti, Koasati, Pensacola, Seminole, Yamacraw, Yamasi, and Yazoo. Of these tribes the Choctaw on the west were short and heavy, the Creeks taller and more active. The Chicasa were the most warlike and the best hunters, the Choctaw the most agricultural and, together with the Creeks, the most advanced in culture. All the tribes had fixed villages, the larger fortified by palisades and embankments. Several confederacies were established within the stock, of which the Creek was the most widely known. The present number of the stock is over 30,000.

Muski (mōs'kē). A people often mentioned in the cuneiform inscriptions, settled somewhere north of Cappadocia. They are identified with the Moschi of the Greek writers, and the Meshech of the Old Testament. They were much less civilized than the Chibchas, with whom they were at war, and they made a long and valorous resistance to the Spaniards, finally committing suicide in great numbers rather than submit to them. The Muso emerald-mines were in their district.

Muspellsheim (mōs'pelsh-him). [ON. Muspells-heimr.] In the Old Norse cosmogony, the realm of fire and warmth in the south. At Ragnarok, the end of the world, the race of Muspellheim, coming with his flaming sword at the head of the Muspellssons and destroys the world with fire. Also Musgel or Muspelsheal.

Muspili. [OHG. Muspilli, OS. Mudspelli, Mutspelli, the end of the world, Icel. Muspell, an abode of fire (see Muspellsheim); of uncertain origin, but usually explained as from OHG. mutta, AS. mōdor, etc., earth (E. mould), and spellian*, OS. spillian, AS. spillan, destroy (E. spill.)] A fragmentary Old High German poem on the end of the world. It is unknown authorship, written in alliterative verse. It exists in a single manuscript, from about the year 900, in the Bavarian dialect.

> "Muspili" belongs to a time when myths of the old heathen mythology blended with the faith of the new consorts for the last time. Elijah, as a common myth, appears; was a great world of fire that at the end would break out and devour the earth and all that was upon it. "Muspili" therefore gives us the famous the final confusion of the world; and that is the subject of this fragment, which shows also an adaptation of pre-Christian to Christian ideas in the fight of Elias with Antichrist, which may answer to the contest between Thor and Surtur.

Musset (mū-sā'). Louis Charles Alfred de. Born at Paris, Nov. 11, 1810; died there, May 1, 1857. A celebrated French poet. His father, Musset-Pathay, was a man of letters, and encouraged in his children the love of letters. Alfred de Musset graduated with high honors from the College Henri IV. in Paris, and had just completed his twentieth year when he published his first volume of poetry, "Contes d'Espagne et d'Italie" (1830). Two more collections of poems established his fame—"Poésies diverses" (1831) and "Le spectacle dans un fauteuil" (1832). In 1833 he went to Italy with George Sand; but, after an extended trip, fell out with her at Venice, and returned to France alone. His morbid state of mind finds expression in the "Confession d'un enfant du siècle" (1836). During these years (1832–37) De Musset contributed a number of short plays to the "Revue des Deux Mondes": they have appeared since then as "Comédies et proverbes" (1840). Short stories from the same magazine (1837–39) were also reprinted in book form (1840). In the same year (1840) appeared the first edition of the "Poésies nouvelles." One of his last publications is a volume of "Contes" (1854). He was received in the French Academy in 1852. Irregular and dissolute living undermined his health, and he died a tragical end, and he died at the age of forty-seven. His complete works were published in 1865.

From 1760 he resided in New Granada where, under government auspices, he traveled extensively. His "Flora de Nueva Granada," on which he worked 40 years, was unfinished at the time of his death, and has never been published. Mutis is known especially for his publications on cinchona plants.

Muttra (mut'trä). 1. A district in the Northwest Provinces, British India, intersected by lat. 27° 30′ N., long. 77° 45′ E. Area, 1,453 square miles. Population (1881), 671,690.—2. The capital of the district of Muttra, situated on the Jumna 30 miles south-northwest of Agra. It combines Hindu shrine and has been often plundered by Mohammedans. Population (1881), including cantonment, 61,139.

Mutzig (mōt'sig). A small town in Alsace, 16 miles west of Strasburg.

Muyscas. See Chibchas.

Muzaffargarh (muz-af-ar-gar'). A district in the Panjab, British India, intersected by lat. 30° N., long. 71° E. Area, 3,139 square miles. Population (1881), 338,035.

Muzaffarnagar (muz-af-ar-nag'är), or Mozufferngger (moz-uf-fer-ng'ger). 1. A district in the Northwest Provinces, British India, intersected by lat. 29° 30′ N., long. 77° 30′ E. Area, 1,656 square miles. Population (1881), 758,444.—2. The capital of the district of Muzaffarnagar, 65 miles north-northeast of Delhi. Population (1881), 15,080.

Muzaffarpur (muz-af-ar-pör'), or Mozufferpore (moz-uf-fer-pōr'). 1. A district of Bengal, British India, intersected by lat. 26° N., long. 85° 30′ E. Area, 3,003 square miles. Population (1881), 2,582,060.—2. The capital of the district of Muzaffarpur, situated on the Little Gandak 37 miles north-northeast of Patna. Population (1881), 42,460.

Muziano (mōt-sē-ä'nō), Girolamo. Born near Brescia, Italy, 1528: died about 1590. An Italian painter of historical pieces and landscapes, and worker in mosaics.

Muzo. See Muso.

Mwanga (mwäng'gä). The successor of Mtesa as king of Uganda. He persecuted the Christians and ordered the murder of Bishop Hannington. Driven from his kingdom, he became a Catholic and regained his throne by the aid of Catholics and Protestants; was conquered by British arms, and became a Protestant; and is now (1886) a vassal of the British crown.

Mycale (mik'a-lē). [Gr. Μυκάλη.] In ancient geography, a mountain in Lydia, Asia Minor, north of Miletus. Near it, in Sept., 479 B. C., on the same day as the battle of Platæa, the Greeks under Leotychides and Xanthippus defeated the Persian naval forces.

Mycenæ (mi-sē'nē). [Gr. Μυκῆναι.] In ancient geography, a city of Argolis, Greece, 14 miles south-southwest of Corinth. It is a very ancient settlement, conspicuous in Greek mythology, and supplying some of the oldest materials for the study of Greek architecture and art. It consisted of the acropolis, occupying the apex of a hill, and the lower town, whose confused ruins are spread over its slopes. The acropolis is triangular, and is surrounded by a massive wall of huge stones, partly shaped. It is entered by the Gate of the Lions. This gate is at the end of a walled passage. The opening is about 10 feet wide and high, tapering toward the top, with monolithic jambs and a huge lintel. Above the lintel a huge triangular opening is formed by corbelling, and the great slab, 2 feet thick, which fills this bears the remarkable relief of two affronted rampant lions separated by a column. Close inside of this gate, in a double circle of upright stones 80 feet in diameter, were found the tombs containing golden ornaments and masks, inlaid sword-blades, and other objects whose discovery astonished the scientific world. More recent excavations have disclosed on the acropolis a prehistoric palace resembling that at Tiryns. The most important monuments of the lower town are the great "beehive" tombs commonly called treasuries. Of these the so-called treasury of Atreus is a typical example. The interior is a circle about 50 feet in diameter and the same in height, covered with a pseudo-dome formed by corbelling in the horizontal courses of the wall. A door opens into a square side chamber. The entrance to the tomb is by an inclined passage or dromos, over 20 feet long, leading to a door 19½ feet high, which is spanned by an enormous lintel. Over the lintel there is a large triangular opening, which was originally filled with a sculptured slab. The original fruitful excavations were made by Schliemann in 1876–77, and much work has since been done on the site by the Archæological Society of Athens. The discoveries at Mycenæ threw a flood of light upon the earliest Greek art, particularly in the department of pottery. They were the first important finds of their class, which has since been recognized in a large proportion of Greek settlements of sufficient age, and is every where distinguished as Mycenæan. Mycenæan ornament includes geometric decoration, foliage, marine and animal forms, and the human figure. It may be dated back to the 12th century B. C., and follows in time the art of the "Homeric city" at Hissarlik, which is without painted decoration, and that of Thera. Mycenæan art was practised and developed through several centuries, and existed contemporaneously with the succeeding dipylon style of decoration, which began about 1000 B. C. The chief objects found at Mycenæ are in a museum at Athens.

Mycerinus (mis-ē-rī'nus), or Mecherinus (mē-ke-rī'nus). King of Egypt. According to Herodotus and Diodorus, he was the son of Cheops who reigned about 3700 B. C. He succeeded his uncle Chephren. Having been warned by an oracle that he had but six years to live, because, being a gentle ruler, he had not wreaked the vengeance of the gods on Egypt, he gave himself up to pleasure and sought to double his allotted time by turning night into day.

Mydas. See Midas.

Myddleton (mid'l-ton), Sir Hugh. Born about 1555: died Dec. 10, 1631. A goldsmith, capitalist, and projector of the "New River" water-supply of London. In 1605 an act was passed permitting him to bring water into London from New River at Ware, Hants.

Myer (mī'ėr), Albert James. Born at Newburg, N. Y., Sept. 20, 1827: died at Buffalo, N. Y., Aug. 24, 1880. An American meteorologist. He became chief signal-officer in the United States army in 1860, and was in charge of the Weather Bureau in 1870. He published "Manual of Signals" (1868).

Mylæ (mī'lē). [Gr. Μύλαι.] The ancient name of Milazzo (which see).

Mylasa (mi-lā'sä), or Mylassa (mi-las'sä). [Gr. τὰ Μύλασα or Μύλασσα.] In ancient geography, an inland town of Caria: the modern Melasso. It was the capital of the later Carian kingdom.

Mylau (mē'lou). A town in the kingdom of Saxony, situated on the Göltzsch 12 miles southwest of Zwickau. Population (1890), 6,353.

Mymensing, or Mymensingh. See Maimansinh.

My Novel, or Varieties of English Life. A novel by Bulwer Lytton, published in 1853.

Mynpuri, or Mynpooree. See Mainpuri.

Myonnesus (mi-ō-nē'sus). [Gr. Μυόννησος.] In ancient geography, a promontory on the coast of Ionia, Asia Minor, 27 miles northwest of Ephesus. Near it, 190 B. C., the Romans under L. Emilius gained a naval victory over the Syrians under Antiochus the Great.

Myra (mī'rä). [Gr. Μύρα or Μύρων.] In ancient geography, a city in Lycia, Asia Minor, situated near the coast in lat. 36° 17′ N., long. 30° 3′ E. An ancient theater here is among the finest in Asia Minor. The masonry is admirable; the back wall of the stage is ornamented with Composite columns, having shafts of polished granite and capitals of white marble.

Myrina (mi-rī'nä). A very extensive Greek necropolis, near Smyrna, Asia Minor, discovered about 1870, and systematically excavated by the French School at Athens between 1880 and 1882. It is of importance for the very abundant and beautiful terra-cotta figurines found, which make it the richest site for art objects of this nature after Tanagra. The Myrina figurines are for the most part of the Hellenistic epoch, and in treatment and composition are akin to those of Tanagra, though in general less severe in style. Many examples show remarkable grace, and the average size is larger than that of the Tanagra figurines. Groups and combinations of figures are frequent. The most important collections are in the Louvre and in the museum at Constantinople.

Myrmidon (mėr'mi-don). [Gr. Μυρμιδών.] In Greek mythology, a son of Zeus, reputed ancestor of the Myrmidons.

Myrmidons (mėr'mi-donz). In Greek legendary history, a race in Phthiotis, Thessaly. They were led by Achilles in the Trojan war. According to one legend, they came originally from Ægina.

Myron (mī'ron). [Gr. Μύρων.] Lived about 500–440 B. C. A celebrated Greek sculptor, a native of Eleutheræ in Bœotia: a pupil of Ageladas of Argos. Polycletus and Phidias were his fellow-pupils. Like the sculptors of the Doric or Argive school, his main interest was centered in the athlete. He considered the subject, however, more from the standpoint of action than of proportion. He represents the attitudes of the active rather than the beauty of the passive athlete. In this he was considered supreme throughout antiquity. His most representative work was probably the Discobolus described by Quintilian and Lucian. Of this statue the most perfect replica is in the possession of Prince Lancelotti in Rome; another is in the Vatican, and another in the British Museum. His group of Athene and Marsyas is represented by the Marsyas of the Lateran. Myron's bronze cow on the Pnyx at Athens was one of the favorites of the Greek and Roman world.

Myrrha (mir'ä). [Gr. Μύρρα.] In Greek legend, the mother of Adonis.

In the Kyprian myth the name of Theias is transformed into Kinyras; but, like Theias, he is the father of Adonis by his daughter Myrrha. Myrrha is the invention of a popular etymology: the true form of the name was Smyrna or Myrina, a name famous in the legendary annals of Asia Minor. Myrina or Smyrna, it was said, was an Amazonian queen, and her name is connected with the four cities of the western coast—Smyrna, Kymē, Myrina, and Ephesos—whose foundation was ascribed to Amazonian heroines. Sayce, Anc. Babylonians, p. 235.

Myrtilus (mėr'ti-lus). [Gr. Μυρτίλος.] In Greek legend, the charioteer of Œnomaus, king of Elis, thrown by Pelops into the Ægean Sea (whence the name Myrtoan for that part of the Ægean). While drowning he cursed the home of Pelops, a curse which brought many woes upon the descendants of his enemy. He was placed among the constellations as Auriga (the Charioteer).

Myrtoan Sea (mėr-tō'an sē). [L. Mare Myrtoum: sea Myrtilus.] In ancient geography, that part of the Ægean Sea which lies south of Argolis, Attica, and Eubœa.

Mysia (mish'iä). [Gr. Μυσία.] In ancient geography, a district in the northwestern part of Asia Minor. It is bounded by the Propontis on the north, Bithynia and Phrygia on the east, Lydia on the south, the Ægean on the west, and the Hellespont on the northwest, the Troad being sometimes excluded. It is traversed by mountain-ranges. There were many Greek cities on the coasts. It belonged successively to Lydia, Persia, Macedon, Syria, Pergamum, and Rome. The Mysians were probably allied to the Lydians. They assisted the Khita against Rameses II.

Myslowitz (mēs-lō'vits). A town in the province of Silesia, Prussia, situated on the Przemsa 34 miles west-northwest of Cracow. Population (1890), 9,392.

Mysore (mī-sōr'), or Maisur (mī-sōr'). 1. A native state in the Deccan, India, surrounded by British territory. It is mountainous and hilly in the west. It became an important state in the 17th century; under Hyder Ali and Tippu Saib was a formidable opponent of the British in the last part of the 18th century; was ceded in part to the British in 1792 and 1799; was taken under British management in 1831; was restored to native rule in 1881; and is governed by a maharaja tributary to Great Britain. Area, 27,936 square miles. Population (1891), 4,943,604. 2. The capital of the state of Mysore, situated about lat. 12° 18′ N., long. 76° 40′ E. It is the residence of the maharaja. Population (1891), 74,048.

Mysteries of Udolpho, The. A romance by Mrs. Radcliffe, published in 1794.

Mystery of Edwin Drood, The. An unfinished novel by Dickens, the first number of which was issued in April, 1870. It was to have been completed in twelve monthly parts, but only about six were written when he died.

Mythen (mē'ten), The. Two peaks in the canton of Schwyz, Switzerland, 20 miles east of Lucerne. Height of the Great Mythen, 6,245 feet.

Mytilene, or Mitylene (mit-i-lē'nē). [Gr. Μυτιλήνη or Μιτυλήνη.] 1. A name sometimes given to the island of Lesbos (which see).—2. In ancient geography, the chief city of Lesbos, situated on the coast. It was an important maritime power of the Æolian Greeks. It revolted from Athens in 428 B. C., and was subjected in 427. Present population, about 20,000.

Myus (mī'us). [Gr. Μυοῦς.] In ancient geography, an Ionian city in Caria, Asia Minor, situated on the Mæander 11 miles northeast of Miletus.

Mzab (mzäb). A district in Algeria, about lat. 33° N., long. 4° E. There is a river of the same name. The chief place is Gardaia.

Naaman (nā'a-man). In Old Testament history, a Syrian general who was miraculously cured of leprosy on bathing in the Jordan at the command of the prophet Elisha.

Naarden (när'den). A town in the province of North Holland, Netherlands, 13 miles southeast of Amsterdam. It was destroyed by the Spaniards in 1572.

Naas (nās or nā'as). A town in County Kildare, Ireland, southwest of Dublin. It was the former capital of Leinster.

Naas. See Nasqa.

Nabatæans, or Nabateans (nab-a-tē'anz). An Arab people dwelling in ancient times on the east and southeast of Palestine: often identified with the people mentioned in the Old Testament under the name of Nebaioth (Isa. lx. 7), and (1 Mac. v. 25) as Nabathites. Their ancestor Nebajoth is spoken of as the first-born of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 13). They are referred to in Assyrian inscriptions of the 7th century B. C., but the period of their greatest historical importance was the two centuries immediately preceding and succeeding the Christian era. They seem to have been for a long time the chief traders between Egypt and the valley of the Euphrates. Important Nabatæan inscriptions have been recovered, and the rock-inscriptions in the valleys around Mount Sinai have been attributed to them.

Nabha. See Nacha.

Nabi (nā-bē'). A Turkish poet of the 17th century. See the extract.

> The next notable poet is Nābi, in the time of Sultans Ibrāhim (1640–1648) and Mohammed IV. (1648–1687). About this time the Persian Sāib was introducing in his own country a new style of Ghazel-writing, marked by a philosophizing, or rather a moralizing, tendency. Nābi copied him, and consequently brought this new style into Turkish literature.

Nabis (nā'bis). Killed 192 B. C. Tyrant of Sparta 207–192 B. C. He was conquered by the Romans under Flamininus 195 B. C.

Nablus (nab-lōs'), or Nabulus (nā-bō-lōs'). A city in Palestine, 28 miles north of Jerusalem. It is noted for manufactures, particularly of soap. It occupies the site of Shechem (which see), later called Neapolis (of which Nablus is a corruption). Population, 20,000.

Nabob (nā'bob), The. A play by Foote, produced in 1772.

Nabonassar (nab-ō-nas'ār). King of Babylonia 747–733 B. C.

Nabonassar, Era of. An era sometimes used in ancient chronology, reckoned from the accession of Nabonassar (747 B. C.).

Nabonidus (nab-ō-nī'dus). [Babylonian Nabû-na'id, Nebo elevated.] The last king of Babylonia (555–538 B. C.). He seems to have belonged to the priestly class, and was active in the repairing of sanctuaries, but neglected Merodach and Nabu, on account of which he estranged from himself the priesthood: this to some extent facilitated the conquest of the empire by Cyrus in 538. According to Eusebius, Nabonidus after the fall of Babylon fortified himself in Borsippa, and when this was taken by Cyrus, the conqueror generously gave him a town in Carmania as his residence. But from a cylinder of Cyrus it seems that Nabonidus was treacherously delivered into the hands of Gobryas, the general of Cyrus, and died in a mysterious manner. It appears, from inscriptions of his which have been recovered, that he had a strong historical interest; and several historical statements of great importance for the chronology of the Babylonian empire are recorded by him. For the relation of the cuneiform accounts of the last Babylonian king and that of the Book of Daniel, see Belshazzar and Cyrus.

Nabopolassar (na-bō-pō-las'sär). [Babylonian Nabû-bal-iṣṣur, Nebo protects the son.] The founder of the new Babylonian empire (625–604 B. C.). He ruled, it seems, first over Babylonia as viceroy of Assyria. He then entered into an alliance with the Median king Cyaxares, who gave his daughter in marriage to his son Nebuchadnezzar; and by their united efforts the destruction of the Assyrian empire was brought about in 608 B. C. Besides this little is known about Nabopolassar's person or reign.

Naboth (nā'both). In Old Testament history, a Jezreelite put to death by Ahab, who coveted his property.

Nabu. See Nebo.

Nabulus. See Nablus.

Nachen, The. A ship of 200 tons burden, commanded by Edwarde Brawnde, which sailed from Dartmouth, England, March 8, 1615, to make "further tryall" of the New England coast. Brawnde also went to Cape Cod to search for pearls.

Nachi (nā'chē). or Nadchés, or Nahy, or Naguatez. A tribe or confederacy of North American Indians, which dwelt on St. Catharine's Creek, east and south of the present city of Natchez, Mississippi. The name belonged to a single town, but was used to include a confederacy of towns some of which were those of alien peoples who had been subjugated by the Nachi or had taken refuge among them. D'Iberville visited them in 1699, and gave a list of 8 of these towns. They had conflicts with the French, the last of which in 1729 broke up the confederacy, but did not exterminate the people, as has been generally stated. They still remain, however, and the larger part were received by the Chicasa. A few still live among the Creek and Cherokee in the Indian Territory. See Natchesan.

Nachiketas (na-chi-kā'tas), or Nachiketa. In the Taittiriyabrahmana and the Katha Upanishad, the son of Vajashravasa. Desirous of attaining blessedness, the latter performed great sacrifices. The son told him that he had not given all, for he, his son, was left, and said, "To whom shall I be given?" When he repeated the question the father angrily replied, "To death," and so the son went to the abode of Yama, who was constrained to offer him three boons. Nachiketas prayed to see his father again and be reconciled. This boon granted, he sought a knowledge of the sacrificial fire that takes one surely to immortality, and then asked that Yama should solve the doubt that there is in regard to the existence of a man that is departed, whereupon Yama instructed him as to the duties, nature, and destiny of the soul.

Nachod (nä'chōd). A town in northeastern Bohemia, situated on the Metau 78 miles eastnortheast of Prague. Here, June 27, 1866, the Prussians under Von Steinmetz defeated the Austrians. Population (1890), commune, 6,364.

Nachtigal (näch'tē-gäl), Gustav. Born at Eichstedt, Germany, Feb. 23, 1834; died off Cape Palmas, Liberia, April 20, 1885. An African explorer. Seeking a warm climate for his diseased lungs, he visited Algeria and Tunis in 1863, where he became physician to the bey. In 1868 he was intrusted with the delivery of presents from the Prussian king to the Sultan of Bornu. Successively he explored Fezzan and Ghiesti (1870), Kuka, Kanem, Borku, and again Kuka (1872), Baghirmi and Wadai (1873), and Darfur (1874), and in 1875 returned over Egypt to Germany. "Sahara und Sudan" appeared in 1879–81. Until 1882 he was president of the Gesellschaft fur Erdkunde and of the Afrikanische Gesellschaft: then he went as consul to Tunis, and in 1884 as German imperial commissioner to West Africa. Here he annexed Togoland, Angra Pequena, and Kamerun. He succumbed to fever on board ship, and was buried at Cape Palmas, Liberia.

Nacidoc (nā-shē'dōsh), or Natchitoches. A tribe of the Caddo Confederacy of North American Indians. See Caddo.

Nacionales (nā-thē-ō-nā'lāz). A political party of Chile, formed by a union of conservatives and liberals, under the leadership of Francisco Ignacio, Ossa about 1857. At times it has been very prominent, but it has never carried a national election.

Nacolela (nak-ō-lē'yä), or Nacolia (na-kō'li-ä). In ancient geography, a place in the northern part of Phrygia, Asia Minor. Here, 366 A. D., the emperor Valens defeated Procopius.

Nacosari (nā-kō-sā'rē). A town in eastern Sonora, in the neighborhood of which are very extensive copper-mines. The high peak in its neighborhood bears the name of Cerro de Nacosari.

Nævius (nē'vi-us), Cnæus. Died at Utica, Africa, 204 B. C. A Roman dramatic and epic poet. He wrote comedies, tragedies, and an epic on the first Punic war. (Fragments edited by Klussmann, Vahlen, and Ribbeck.)

> Cn. Nævius (269?–204 B. C.), a Campanian of Latin extraction, and probably not a Roman citizen, had in his early manhood fought in the first Punic war. At its conclusion he came to Rome, and applied himself to literary work. He seems to have brought out his first play as early as 235 B. C. His work mainly consisted of translations from the Greek; he essayed both tragedy and comedy, but his genius inclined him to prefer the latter.

On the same rock the Egyptian king Rameses II. carved a similar monument commemorating his triumph over the Hittites in the battle at Kedesh (1288 B. C.).

Nahuas (nä'wäs), or Nahuatlecas (nä-wät-lä'käs). A collective name for the Indian tribes which formed the dominant race of the Mexican plateau at the time of the Spanish conquest. According to the most generally credited traditions they had come from the north or northwest some centuries before. They were divided into many petty tribes, each with its public or town, and these were often at war with each other. Clustered in and about the lakes of the valley of Mexico were the pueblos of Tenochtithan or Mexico, Tezcuco, Chalco, Tlacopan (whose inhabitants were called Tecpanecs) and Xochimilco. The Tlascalans occupied a mountainous region and Cholula, Cuernavaca, and other pueblos were scattered over the plateau. The Nahuatl language was commonly spoken over a large area, and tended to drive out other tongues. During the 14th and 15th centuries Tenochtithan, Tezcuco, and Tlacopan became allies: the dominant member of the league was at first Tezcuco, later Tenochtitlan. The confederate arms spread over the valley of Mexico, and were carried to the Gulf, the Pacific, and Guatemala; but within this region many tribes were unconquered, and some conquests were only temporary. Opinions differ as to the true status of the conquered regions, but the tendency is to reject the idea of an Aztec 'empire.' It appears that most of the pueblos and tribes acknowledged in some sort the power of Mexico, and paid tribute to it, but without being in absolute subjection. All the Nahuas built large towns, cultivated the ground, were skilful in gold- and feather-work, etc., and used hieroglyphic writing in books and accounts. They were also enterprising traders; but they were no more advanced in civilization than the Mayas are to the southeast, and their civil polity was far inferior to that of the Peruvians. Their religion was degraded by revolting human sacrifices and it appears that most of their numerous wars were waged to obtain victims for their gods. After the fall of Tenochtitlan or Mexico (1521), they made little resistance to the Spaniards, and soon sank in a condition of semi-slavery. About 2,000,000 Indians of the Mexican plateau are now classed as Nahuas. The name Aztecs is sometimes used for all the Nahua tribes: more commonly it is restricted to those which formed the above-mentioned league, or to that of Tenochtitlan alone. See Aztecas, Mexico, and Nahuatlecan stock.

Nahuatl (nä'wätl), or Nahua (nä'wä). The language of the Nahuas, commonly called Aztec. It was divided into various dialects differing but slightly from each other. The Nahuatl tongue is still spoken by several hundred thousand Mexican Indians, but is gradually dying out. See Nahuatlecan stock.

Nahuatlecan stock (nä-wät-lä'kan stok). A linguistic stock or substock of Mexican and Central American Indians. It includes the Nahua tribes (see Nahuas) and a few small scattered tribes (the Seguas, Nicaraos, etc.) as far south as Nicaragua and Costa Rica. Many modern ethnologists regard this as a branch of a much larger stock extending as far north as Idaho and Oregon, and called by Brinton the Uto-Aztecan stock.

Nakhon Wat (nä-khōn' wät). A temple situated about 5 miles south of Nakhon or Ankhor, the ancient capital of Cambodia. It is the finest architectural creation of Cambodia, dating from the 13th century. The plan presents three concentric rectangular inclosures, the exterior one measuring 570 by 650 feet, and each rising above that without it, so that the general form is pyramidal, an effect which is enhanced by the flanking of the great pointed tooth-battlemented central tower by similar smaller side towers. The exterior is colonnaded with coupled square pillars on a raised basement, all the masonry being admirable. Above the pillars there is an elaborate entablature with a frieze of projecting serpent-heads and very rich moldings. In the middle of each face there is a large triple portal. The back walls of the portticos which extend from these bear remarkable friezes in low relief, most of the subjects being battle-scenes from the Ramayana or Mahabharata, about 64 feet high and 2,000 in aggregate length. The entrance-hall contains over 200 square columns. The temple proper, 280 by 233 feet, stands in the central court; it surrounds a large water-tanks so disposed that the middle portion of the structure is cruciform. The plan is closely similar to Indian types, but the con-tructive and decorative details are purely local. The capitals are almost classical in form, and there are no bracket-capitals.

Nakkar (nak'kär), or Nekkar (nek'kär). [Ar.: apparently from al-bakkar, the digger; but probably an error of transcription for al-bakkar, the herdsman, as given by Ibn Junis.] The usual name of the third-magnitude star β Boötis, in the head of the figure.

Nala (na'lä). 1. King of Nishadha, and husband of Damayanti. The episode of Nala and Damayanti is one of the most celebrated of the Mahabharata. It has been translated into English by Milman, and later by W. Edwin Arnold in his "Indian Idyls." Its most extensive translations into German (by Bopp, Holtzmann, Kosegarten, Meier, and Rückert), and it has been translated into Latin by Bopp, and into French by Pavie. It is characterized by Nala tells "the pearl of girls," Damayanti, daughter of the king of Vidarbha, of his graces, and she loves him. King Bhima holds for his daughter a swayamvara (literally 'self-choice'), a festival at which a princess of which a girl of the warrior (kshatriya) caste was allowed freely to choose her husband. The chief gods hear of it, and go, on their way they meet Nala, also going, and bid him go to Damayanti and sue for them. They enable the reluctant but obedient Nala to enter Damayanti's chamber, where he tells her that the gods desire her hand. She informs Nala that she will choose him even though the gods be present. At the svayamvara the four chief gods assume the appearance of Nala. Unable to distinguish the real Nala, the princess prays to the gods and they resume their divine attributes, whereupon she chooses Nala to the grief of the kings and the delight of the gods. These give Nala magic gifts; the wedding feast is celebrated; and Nala returns to Nishadha with his bride, where they live happily and have a son and daughter, Indrasena and Indrasena. Later, however, Nala loses everything, even his kingdom, by gambling, and wanders in the forest. Transformed into a dwarf, he becomes the charioteer of Rituparna, king of Oudh. Damayanti, after fruitless search, hears rumors that Nala is at Oudh. She offers her hand to Rituparna if he will drive from Oudh to Kundina, some 500 miles, in a single day, knowing that only Nala is equal to the task. Nala drives Rituparna there through the air, and is rewarded by perfect skill in throwing the dice. His wife recognizes him by his magic command of fire and water and his cooking. He resumes his kingdom, wins back all he had lost, and lives happily with Damayanti ever after. The story is told by the sage Brihadashva to Yudhishthira when Arjuna has gone to Indra's heaven to get divine weapons, leaving the other Pandavas in the forest with Draupadi lamenting the absence of Arjuna and the loss of their kingdom.

2. A monkey chief who, in the Ramayana, has the power of making stones float, and builds the bridge from the continent to Ceylon, over which Rama passes with his army.

Napier (nā'pi-ėr). A seaport in the North Island, New Zealand, situated on Hawke Bay 165 miles northeast of Wellington. Population (1891), 8,876.

Napier, Sir Charles. Born at Merchiston Hall, near Falkirk, March 6, 1786: died Nov. 6, 1860. A British admiral. He was the second son of Captain Charles Napier, and cousin of Sir Charles James Napier. He became a midshipman in 1799, lieutenant in 1805, and commander in 1807. In 1811 he served in the Peninsular expedition in America. In Feb., 1825, he took command of the Portuguese fleet. He defended Lisbon in 1834, and was created Count Cape St. Vincent in the peerage of Portugal. He was elected member of Parliament for Marylebone and made rear-admiral in 1842. He commanded the Baltic fleet during the Crimean war, and has been much censured for refusing to obey an order of the admiralty to storm Cronstadt. He wrote the "War in Syria" (1842).

Napier, Sir Charles James. Born at Whitehall, London, Aug. 10, 1782: died at Portsmouth, Aug. 29, 1853. A celebrated British general-officer. In 1808 he was aide-de-camp to General Fox in Ireland; served under Lord Cathcart in Denmark in 1807; and on his return was ordered to Portugal, where he served under Sir John Moore in the retreat to Corunna, where he was captured. He fought in Wellington's Peninsular campaigns, and was present at Cambaya but not at Waterloo. At thirty years of age he entered the military college at Farnham. From 1822 to 1830 he was military resident and governor of Cephalonia. He was made major-general in 1837 and K. C. B. in 1838. In 1841 he undertook the conquest of Sind, which was completed by the victory of Hyderabad, March 24, 1843. He was governor of Sind until 1847. He superseded Lord Gough as commander-in-chief after the battle of Gujrat, and in 1850 returned finally to England. He wrote various works on military and colonial affairs.

Napier, Sir Francis, ninth Baron Napier. Born Sept. 15, 1819. A British statesman. He was British minister at Washington 1857–58, and governor of Madras 1860–72.

Napier, Henry Edward. Born March 5, 1789: died Oct. 13, 1853. A British author, brother of Sir Charles James Napier. He wrote a "Florentine History" (1846–47), etc.

Napier, John. Born at Merchiston, near Edinburgh, 1550: died there, April 4, 1617. A Scottish mathematician, famous as the inventor of logarithms. He was the eldest son of Archibald, the seventh Napier of Merchiston, hereditary justice-general of Scotland. He matriculated at St. Salvator's College, St. Andrews, in 1563, and probably completed his education at the University of Paris. His "Mirifici logarithmorum canonis descriptio," in which his discovery was announced, appeared in 1614. Napier's bones or rods, constructed to simplify multiplication and division, were introduced in the "Rabdologia" (1617). The "Constructio," or method by which the canon was constructed, was published in 1619 by his son Robert.

Napier, Macvey. Born at Glasgow, April 11, 1776; died at Edinburgh, Feb. 11, 1847. A Scottish author and editor. He was educated at Edinburgh and Glasgow. In 1805 he succeeded Jeffrey as editor of the "Edinburgh Review," and was editor of the 7th edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica" (1830-42).

Napier, Robert Cornelis, Lord Napier of Magdala. Born at Ceylon, Dec. 6, 1810; died Jan. 14, 1890. A British general. He was educated at the military colleges at Addiscombe and Chatham, and the Royal Engineers in 1826. In the mutiny (1857) he was chief engineer under Sir Colin Campbell's army, and for bravery at Lucknow was made K. C. B. In 1867 he served in the Abyssinian war in 1868. He commanded the expedition to Abyssinia which culminated in the storming of the heights at Magdala (April 13, 1868). He was commander-in-chief in India 1870-76.

Napier, Sir William Francis Patrick. Born near Dublin, Dec. 17, 1785; died at Clapham, near London, Feb. 12, 1860. A British military historian and general, son of Colonel George Napier, and brother of Sir Charles James Napier. He was with Sir John Moore in the retreat to Corunna, and served in the Peninsular campaigns. He entered the military college at Farnham with his brother Charles, and commanded a regiment in the occupation of France until 1818. Retiring on half-pay, he began his literary career in 1821. In 1823 his "History of the War in the Peninsula" was begun: it was published 1828-40. In 1845 he published "A History of the Conquest of Scinde," in 1851 "A History of the Administration of Scinde," and in 1857 the "Life and Opinions" of his brother, Sir C. J. Napier.

Naples (nā'plz). A province of Italy. Area, 3501 square miles. Population (1891), 1,104,665.

Naples, It. Napoli (nä'pō-lē). [L. Neapolis, Gr. Νεάπολις, the new city: Napl. Napoli, Neapol.] The capital of the province of Naples, Italy, situated on the north side of the Bay of Naples, in lat. 40° 52′ N., long. 14° 15′ E. It has one of the most beautiful situations in Europe, and is the largest city and one of the principal seaports in Italy. The Castel del Ovo, a landmark of Naples, so named from its oval plan, founded in 1154 on a small island connected with the shore by a causeway, was considered a marvel of strength in the 13th century. It now serves as a military prison. The cathedral was begun by Charles of Anjou in 1272, and contains many 13th-century features despite repeated restorations made necessary by earthquakes. It contains many granite columns and marbles from the Roman temples of Neptune and Apollo, besides fine paintings and Gothic tombs. The chapels are of great richness, particularly that of St. Januarius (1608), where the miraculous blood is preserved. The Painted Chapel of the palace throne, supported on spiral columns, has high artistic value. The votive church of San Francesco di Paola, begun in 1817 by Ferdinand I., is a partial imitation of the Pantheon at Rome. Its interior is incrusted with precious marbles, and the dome is 175 feet high. San Martino, the Certosa, or Carthusian Monastery, is remarkable as possessing one of the most lavishly ornamented interiors in existence: floor, piers, and walls are incrusted with precious marbles forming panels and patterns, and the vault is frescoed by Lanfranco, Spagnoletto, and others. The fine old monastic cloisters of wood, and was made by one of the monks. Other objects of interest are the university, royal palace, San Carlo theater, Castel Nuovo, triumphal arch, Palazzo di Capodimonte, observatory, national museum (picture-gallery and collection of antiquities), Villa Nazionale, aquarium, Castel Sant' Elmo, library, conservatory of music, and the churches (besides those noticed above) of Santa Maria del Carmine, San Gennaro (catacombs), Incoronata, Monte Oliveto, Santa Chiara, San Domenico, San Giovanni, San Paolo, and San Lorenzo. Near the city are many noted points, including Posilipo, Cumæ, Lake Avernus, Pozzuoli, Baiæ, Misenum, Mount Vesuvius, Pompeii, Herculaneum, Capri, and Ischia. Naples was a Greek colony from Cumæ; became allied with Rome about 300 B. C.; flourished under Roman rule; suffered in the barbarian invasions; was taken by Belisarius in 536, and by Totila in 543; became the capital of a duchy; was taken by the Normans in 1130; was the capital of the kingdom of Naples and of the Two Sicilies; was the scene of a revolt under Masaniello in 1647; has been the scene of various revolutionary outbreaks, as in 1848. Population (1892), 532,500.

Naples, Bay of. An arm of the Mediterranean, on the coast of Campania, Italy, celebrated for the beauty of its shores.

Naples, Duchy of. A duchy founded in the 6th century, dependent on the Byzantine empire. It became independent in the beginning of the 8th century, and was conquered by the Normans in the 11th and 12th centuries.

Naples, Kingdom of. A former kingdom in southern Italy. It was separated from the kingdom of Sicily under Charles of Anjou in 1282; was united with Aragon 1435-58; was conquered temporarily by Charles VIII. of France in 1495; and was under the rule of Spain 1504-1707, and of Austria 1707-35. See Two Sicilies.

Napo (nä'pō). A river in Ecuador, a northern tributary of the Amazon. Length, estimated, about 700 miles.

Napoleon (na-pō'lē-on; F. pron. nä-pō-lē-ôn') I. (Napoléon Bonaparte or Buonaparte[1]), Born at Ajaccio, Corsica, Aug. 15, 1769, or, more probably, at Corte, Corsica, Jan. 7, 1768[2]; died at Longwood, St. Helena, May 5, 1821. Emperor of the French 1804-14, and was the son of Charles Marie Bonaparte and Letitia Ramolino; studied at the military school of Brienne 1779-84, and at that of Paris 1784-85; and received a lieutenant's commission in the French army in 1785. He opposed the Jacobin movement under Paoli in Corsica in 1793; commanded the artillery in the attack on Toulon in the same year; served in the army in Italy in 1794; and, under the command of Barras, subdued the revolt of the sections at Paris in Oct., 1795. He married Josephine de Beauharnais March 9, 1796. Toward the close of this month (March 27) he assumed command at Nice of the army in Italy, which he found opposed by the Austrians and the Sardinians. He began his campaign April 10, and, after defeating the Austrians at Montenotte (April 12), Millesimo (April 13), and Dego (April 14), turned (April 15) against the Sardinians, whom he defeated at Ceva (April 20) and Mondovi (April 22), forcing them to sign the separate convention of Cherasco (April 29). In the following month he began an invasion of Lombardy, and by a brilliant series of victories, including those of Lodi (May 10) and Arcole (Nov. 15–17), expelled the Austrians from their possessions in the north of Italy, receiving the capitulation of Mantua, their last stronghold, Feb. 2, 1797. Crossing the Alps, he penetrated Styria as far as Leoben, where he dictated preliminaries of peace (April 18). These were followed by Campo-Formio followed (Oct. 17). By the treaty of Campo-Formio northern Italy was reconstructed in the interest of France, which, moreover, acquired the Austrian Netherlands, and received a guarantee of the left bank of the Rhine. Campo-Formio destroyed the coalition against France, and for the time left Napoleon supreme on the Continent. The only enemy that remained to France was England. At the instance of Bonaparte the Directory adopted the plan of attacking the English in India, which involved the conquest of Egypt. Placing at the head of an expedition of about 30,000 men, he set sail from Toulon May 19, 1798; occupied Malta June 12; disembarked at Alexandria July 1; and defeated the Mamelukes in the decisive battle of the Pyramids July 25. He was master of Egypt, but the destruction of his fleet by Nelson in the battle of the Nile (Aug. 1) ruined his communications, and rendered his expedition to failure. Nevertheless he undertook the subjugation of Syria, and stormed Jaffa March 7, 1799. Repulsed at Acre, the defeat of which he attributed to the English, he commenced a retreat to Egypt May 21. He inflicted a final defeat on the Turks at Abukir July 25; transferred the command in Egypt to Kléber Aug. 22; and, setting sail with a few followers, reached Frejus on Oct. 9. During his absence a new coalition had been formed against France, and the Directory saw its armies defeated both on the Rhine and in Italy. With the assistance of his brother Lucien and of Sieyès and Roger Ducos, he executed the coup d'état of Brumaire, whereby he abolished the Directory and established the Consulate, under the title of first consul, holding office for a term of 10 years. He crossed the Great St. Bernard in May, 1800, and restored the French ascendancy in Italy by the victory of Marengo (June 14), which, in that way by Moreau at Hohenlinden (Dec. 3), brought about the peace of Lunéville (Feb. 9, 1801). The treaty of Lunéville, which was based on that of Campo-Formio, destroyed the coalition, and restored peace on the Continent. He concluded the peace of Amiens with England March 27, 1802. After the peace of Lunéville, and concurrently with the reconstruction of France, the public institutions of which had been either destroyed or thrown into confusion during the Revolution, he began the reconstruction and reorganization of the Roman Catholic Church by the Concordat (concluded July 15, 1801), the restoration of higher education by the creation of the new university (May 1, 1802), and the establishment of the Legion of Honor (May 19, 1802). His position had been previously made for the codification of the laws. He was made consul for life Aug. 2, 1802; executed the Duc d'Enghien March 21, 1804; and was crowned hereditary emperor of the French May 18, 1804 (the coronation ceremony took place Dec. 2, 1804); and was crowned king of Italy May 26, 1805. Hostilities with England were renewed without declaring war (May 18, 1803), and a coalition consisting of England, Russia, Austria, and Sweden was formed against France. Napoleon in Spain was at this time. The destruction of the fleet of his brother Louis at the battle of Trafalgar (Oct. 21, 1805) put an end to a projected invasion of England. Breaking up his camp at Toulon, he invaded Austria, occupied Vienna, and (Dec. 2, 1805) defeated the allied Russians and Austrians at Austerlitz. The Russians retired from the contest under a military convention; the Austrians (Dec. 26) signed the treaty of Pressburg. Italy and the coalition was destroyed. His intervention in Germany brought about the erection of the Confederation of the Rhine July 12, 1806. This confederation, which was placed under his protection, ultimately embraced nearly all the states of Germany except Austria and Prussia. Its erection, together with other provocation, caused Prussia to mobilize its army in July, and Napoleon presently found himself opposed by a coalition with Prussia, Russia, and England as its principal members. He crushed the Prussian army at Jena and Auerstädt Oct. 14; entered Berlin Oct. 27; fought the Russians and Prussians in the drawn battle of Eylau Feb. 7–8, 1807; defeated the Russians at the battle of Friedland June 14; and concluded with Russia and Prussia to conclude peace at Tilsit July 7 and 9, 1807, respectively. Russia became the ally of France; Prussia was deprived of nearly half her territory. Napoleon was now perhaps, at the height of his power. The imperial title was no empty form. He was the head of a great confederacy of states. He had surrounded the imperial throne with subordinate thrones occupied by members of his own family. His stepson Eugène de Beauharnais was viceroy of the kingdom of Italy in northern and central Italy; his brother Joseph was king of Naples in southern Italy; his brother Louis was king of Holland; his brother Jerome was king of Westphalia; his brother-in-law Murat was grand duke of Berg. The Confederation of the Rhine existed by virtue of his protection, and his troops occupied dismembered Prussia. He directed the policy of Europe. England alone, mistress of the seas, appeared to stand between him and universal dominion. England was safe from invasion, but she was vulnerable through her commerce. Napoleon undertook to starve her by closing the ports of the Continent against her commerce. This policy, known as "the Continental system," was inaugurated by the Berlin decree in 1806, and was extended by the Milan decree in 1807. To further this policy he resolved to seize the maritime states of Portugal and Spain. His armies expelled the house of Braganza from Portugal, and Nov. 30, 1807, the French entered Lisbon. Under pretense of guarding the coast against the English, he quartered 80,000 troops in Spain, then in 1808 enticed Ferdinand VII. and his father Charles IV. (who had recently abdicated) to Bayonne, extorted from both a renunciation of their claims, and placed his brother Joseph on the Spanish throne. An uprising of the people, and the presence, followed by a popular insurrection in Portugal, movements which found response in Germany. The seizure of Spain and Portugal proved in the end a fatal error. The war which it kindled, known as the Peninsular war, drained him of his resources and placed an enemy in his rear when northern Europe rose against him in 1813. The English in 1808 landed an army in Portugal, where they expelled the French, and penetrated into Spain. Napoleon, securing himself against Austria by a closer alliance with the czar Alexander at Erfurt (concluded Oct. 12, 1808), began in person to operate with 250,000 men, drove out the English, and entered Madrid (Dec. 5, 1808). He was recalled by the threatening attitude of Austria. Hostilities began with the latter in April, 1809. He captured Vienna (May 13), was defeated by the archduke Charles at Aspern and Essling (May 21–22), defeated the archduke at Wagram (July 5–6), and concluded the peace of Schönbrunn Oct. 14, 1809. He divorced Josephine Dec. 16, 1809, and married Maria Louisa of Austria March 11 (April 2), 1810. He annexed the Papal States in 1809 (the Pope was subsequently imprisoned at Savona and Holland in 1810. The refusal of Alexander to carry out strictly the Continental system, which Napoleon himself evaded by the sale of licenses, brought on war with Russia. He crossed the Niemen June 24, 1812; gained the victory of Borodino Sept. 7; and occupied Moscow Sept. 14. His prefer of truce was rejected by the Russians, and he was forced by the approach of winter to begin a retreat (Oct. 19). He was overtaken by the winter, and his army dwindled before the cold, hunger, and the enemy. He left the army in command of Murat (Dec. 5), and reached Paris. Murat recrossed the Niemen Dec. 13, with 100,000 men, the remnant of the Grand Army of 600,000 veterans. The loss sustained by Napoleon in this campaign encouraged the defection of Prussia, which formed an alliance with Russia at Kalisch Feb. 28, 1813. Napoleon defeated the Russians and Prussians at Lützen May 2, and at Bautzen May 20–21. Austria declared war Aug. 12, and Napoleon presently found himself opposed by a coalition of Russia, England, Sweden, Prussia, and Austria, of which the first three had been united since the previous year. He won his last great victory at Dresden Aug. 26–27, and lost the decisive battles of Leipsic (Oct. 16, 18, and 19), Laon (March 9–10, 1814), and Arcis-sur-Aube (March 20–21). On March 31 the Allies entered Paris. He was compelled to abdicate at Fontainebleau April 11, but was allowed to retain the title of emperor, and received the island of Elba as an independent principality, and an annual income of 2,000,000 francs. He arrived in Elba May 4. The Congress of Vienna convened in Sept., 1814, for the purpose of restoring and arranging the relations between the powers disturbed by Napoleon. Encouraged by the quarrels which arose at the Congress between the Allies, Napoleon left Elba Feb. 26, 1815; landed at Cannes March 1; and entered Paris March 20. His troops sent against him, including Ney with his corps, having joined his standard. At the return of Napoleon, the Allies again took the field. He was defeated at Waterloo June 18, 1815, and the Allies entered Paris a second time July 7. After futile attempts to escape to America, he surrendered himself to the English captain Maitland at Rochefort July 15. By a unanimous resolve of the Allies he was transported as prisoner of war to St. Helena, where he arrived on Oct. 16, 1815, and where he was detained the rest of his life.

Napoleon II. (François Charles Joseph Napoléon Bonaparte, Duc de Reichstadt). Born at Paris, March 20, 1811: died at Schönbrunn, near Vienna, July 22, 1832. Titular emperor of the French, son of Napoleon I. and Maria Louisa. He was created duke of Reichstadt in 1818 by his grandfather, Francis I. of Austria, at whose court he resided after his father's overthrow.

Napoleon III. (Charles Louis Napoléon Bonaparte). Born at Paris, April 20, 1808; died at Chiselhurst, near London, Jan. 9, 1873. Emperor of the French 1852–70. He was the son of Louis Bonaparte, king of Holland, and Hortense de Beauharnais, and the nephew of Napoleon I. He lived in exile at Arenenberg and Augsburg 1815–30; joined in an unsuccessful revolt against the Pope in the Romagna 1830–31; made an unsuccessful attempt to organize a revolution among the French soldiers stationed at Strasburg in 1836; made a descent on France near Boulogne in 1840; was captured and imprisoned at Ham until 1846, when he escaped; was made a member of the National Assembly after the fall of Louis Philippe in 1848; was elected president of the republic Dec., 1848; executed the coup d'état of Dec. 2, 1851; was chosen president for 10 years in Dec., 1851; and was elected emperor in Nov., 1852. He married Eugénie de Montijo Jan. 30, 1853; took part in the Crimean war 1854–56; fought with Sardinia against Austria in 1859, and was present at the battles of Magenta and Solferino; interfered in Mexico in 1862; declared war with Germany in July, 1870; was taken prisoner at Sedan Sept. 2; was imprisoned at Wilhelmshohe, near Cassel, 1870–71; and lived at Chiselhurst 1871–73. He was the author of various political and military works, collective editions of which have appeared as "Œuvres" (1854–57), "Œuvres militaires" (1856), and "Histoire de Jules César" (1865–66).

Napoleon, Prince (Napoléon Eugène Louis Jean Joseph Bonaparte). See Bonaparte.

Napoleonic Wars. A general name for the wars

[1] The spelling Bonaparte was used in Napoleon's father, and by Napoleon himself down to 1796, although the spelling Buonaparte occurs in early Italian documents.

[2] Aug. 15, 1760, is the commonly accepted date of Napoleon's birth; and Jan. 7, 1768, that of the birth of his brother Joseph. There seems to be good reason, however, for believing that these dates were interchanged at the time of Napoleon's admission to the military school of Brienne (1779), no candidate being eligible after 10 years of age.

in which Napoleon Bonaparte was the leading figure, 1796–1815. France was opposed to Great Britain, and at different times to Austria, Prussia, Russia, Spain, etc. The principal seats of the wars were Italy, Spain, Portugal, Switzerland, Germany, Austria, Russia, Egypt, Syria, and the ocean. The wars at the beginning of the period form part of those growing out of the French Revolution (which see). The following are the leading events after 1795: Napoleon took command of the army of Italy, spring of 1796; battle of Lodi, May 10; campaign of Moreau on the Upper Rhine (retreat through the Black Forest), 1796; campaign of Jourdan on the Main, 1796; battle of Castiglione, Aug. 5; battle of Arcola, Nov. 15–17; siege of Mantua, 1796–97; battle of Rivoli, Jan., 1797; preliminary treaty of Leoben, April 18; treaty of Campo-Formio, Oct. 17; French expedition to Egypt, 1798; battle of the Pyramids, July 21; battle of the Nile, Aug. 1; battle of Mount Tabor, April, 1799; French defeats in Italy (Trebbia, June, and Novi, Aug.); battle of Abukir, July 25; Suvarof's retreat to the Alps, 1799; battles of Zurich, 1799; passage of Great St. Bernard by Napoleon, May, 1800; battle of Marengo, June 14; battle of Hohenlinden, Dec. 3; treaty of Luneville, Feb. 9, 1801; battle of the Baltic, April 2; treaty of Amiens, March 27, 1802; renewal of the war with Great Britain, 1803; new coalition against France, 1805; surrender of Ulm, Oct. 17; battle of Trafalgar, Oct. 21; battle of Austerlitz, Dec. 2; treaty of Pressburg, Dec. 26; battles of Jena and Auerstadt, Oct. 14, 1806; battle of Eylau, Feb. 8, 1807; battle of Friedland, June 14; treaty of Tilsit, July; Peninsular war (which see), 1808–14; battle of Aspern, May 21–22, 1809; battle of Wagram, July 5, 6; treaty of Vienna, Oct. 14; invasion of Russia, 1812; battle of Borodino, Sept. 7; battle of Moscow, Sept.; retreat from Russia, Oct.–Dec.; battle of Lutzen, May 2, 1813; battle of Bautzen, May 20, 21; battle of Katzbach, Aug. 26; battle of Dresden, Aug. 26, 27; battle of Dennewitz, Sept. 6; battle of Leipsic, Oct. 16–19; Napoleon's last victories at Montmirail, Feb., 1814; battle of Bar-sur-Aube, Feb. 27; battle of Laon, March 10; battle of Arcis-sur-Aube, March 20, 21; treaty of Paris, May 30; Napoleon lands at Cannes, March 1, 1815; battles of Ligny and Quatre-Bras, June 16; battle of Waterloo, June 18; treaty of Paris, Nov. 20.

Napoléon le Petit (nä-pō-lā-ôn lē pē-tē'), [F., 'Napoleon the Little.'] A satire by Victor Hugo, directed against Napoleon III., published in 1853.

Napos (nä'pōs), or Napeanos (nä-pā-ā'nōs). A name given to various semi-civilized Indians of eastern Ecuador and Peru, on the river Napo. They are apparently derived from various stocks which have been assimilated by the Spanish mission villages. At present most of them speak dialects of the Quichua.

Naquet (nä-kā'), Alfred Joseph. Born at Carpentras, France, Oct. 6, 1834. A French chemist and radical politician. He was professor of chemistry at the technical institute of Palermo 1863–65, and was a member of the French Senate 1882–89. His chief work is "Principes de chimie" (1865).

Nara (nä'rä). A city in the main island of Japan, about 25 miles south of Kioto. It was the capital in the 8th century. A colossal statue of Buddha, erected in the Daibouts temple here, is an exceedingly remarkable work, and the largest existing bronze casting. It dates from 739, and is formed of several pieces skilfully soldered together. The right hand, and the symbolic lotus flower, with the right hand open and raised, and the extended left resting on his knee. The drapery has almost Greek breadth and lightness, and the anatomy and expression are admirable, as is the technical finish. The height, without the pedestal, is 85 feet.

Naram-Sin (nä-räm'sin). ['Beloved of the moon-god Sin.'] King of Babylon, son of Sargon I. of Agade. Following a notice of the annals of Naboniddu, we learn that this Babylonian king stands in the year 550 B. C., that while repairing the sun-temple at Sippar he discovered the foundation cylinders of that edifice laid by Naram-sin, the son of Sargon, 3,200 years before. Assyriologists assume 3750 B. C. as the date of Naram-Sin.

Narasinha (na-ra-sin'ha). [Skt., 'the man-lion.'] The fourth avatar or incarnation of Vishnu. He assumed the shape of a creature half man half lion, to deliver the world from the tyrant Hiranyakashipu, who obtained, as a boon from Brahma that he should be slain neither by god, nor man, nor animal, and so was able to usurp the dominion of the three worlds, even appropriating the sacrifices of the gods. When his pious son Prahlada praised Vishnu, the father tried to destroy the boy, whereupon Vishnu appeared suddenly out of a pillar in a shape neither god, nor man, nor animal, and tore Hiranyakashipu to pieces.

Narba (när'bä), or Nabha (nä'bä). A native state in the Panjab, India, under British protection, intersected by lat. 30° 30′ N., long. 76° E. Area, 936 square miles. Population (1891), 282,756.

Narbada. See Nerbudda.

Narbonensis, or Gallia Narbonensis (gal'i-ä när-bō-nen'sis). A province of the Roman empire, covering the southern and southeastern parts of Gaul. It extended from the Alps southwestward along the Mediterranean to the Pyrenees. The northern border was near the line of the Cévennes, the Rhone, and the Lake of Geneva. Its leading cities were Tolosa, Narbo, Nemausus, Arelate, Massilia, and Vienna. Early settlements were made by the Romans in the Provincia in the end of the 2d century B. C.—at Narbo 116 B. C., and at Tolosa about the same time.

Narbonne (när-bon'). An ancient district near the city of Narbonne, in southern France. It had viscounts in the middle ages. As a fief of Toulouse it was united to France in 1229. It formed part of Languedoc. The name Narbonne is sometimes given to the ancient Septimania or Gothia.

Narbonne. A city in the department of Aude, France, on the Canal de la Robine, situated 5 miles from the Mediterranean, in lat. 43° 11′ N., long. 3° E.: the Latin Narbo. It has some trade and manufactures; is celebrated for its honey; and has a museum, a former cathedral (now a church of St. Just), and remains of an archiepiscopal palace. It was an early English center; was colonized by Rome 118 B. C.; and became the capital of Narbonensis. Nebi Yunus (ne-bē' yō'nus). 1. A mound on the site of ancient Nineveh, particularly of the palace of Asurbanipal (668–626 B. C.). It derives its name from the belief of the Mohammedans that the prophet Jonah is buried there, the supposed site of his tomb being now occupied by a mosque.

2. A place in Palestine, near the village of Halhul, which is also supposed to be the site of the tomb of Jonah.

Nebo (nē'bō). [Assyro-Babylonian Nabû.] One of the principal gods of the Babylonians and Assyrians, son of Merodach (Marduk) and husband of Tashmet, the goddess who answers prayer. He was particularly the god of learning, and therefore the patron of the priests and scribes, as he is called the "pastor of tablet-writing," the "wise god," the "god of open ears and wide mind." His principal sanctuary was Ezida "the eternal house," at Borsippa (the temple described by Herodotus as that of Bel), but he had also in the temple of Merodach at Babylon (Esagila) a magnificently adorned chamber. Like Merodach, he was carried in procession through Babylon at the beginning of the year. He is mentioned with Bel (i. e. Bel-Merodach) in Isa. xlvi. 1.

Nebo, Mount, modern Jebel Neba (jeb'el nā'bä). In Bible geography, a summit of Abarim, Moab (2,243 feet), 7 miles northeast of the Dead Sea. It was the place of the death of Moses.

Nebraska (nē-bras'kä). One of the Western States of the United States of America, extending from lat. 40° to 43° N., and from long. 95° 25′ to 104° W. Capital, Lincoln; chief city, Omaha. It is bounded by South Dakota (partly separated by the Missouri) on the north, Iowa and Missouri (separated from both by the Missouri) on the east, Kansas and Colorado on the south, and Colorado and Wyoming on the west. In the northeast the Platte, the surface is rolling. The state is especially fertile in the east. The chief industries are agriculture and grazing. It is one of the leading States in the production of corn. It has 90 counties, sends 2 representatives and 4 to Congress, and has 8 electoral votes. It formed part of the Louisiana Purchase and of Missouri Territory; was settled at Bellevue in 1847; was made a Territory in 1854 (including portions of the present North and South Dakotas, Montana, Wyoming, and Colorado); and was admitted to the Union in 1867. The name is from that of the river. Area, 77,510 square miles. Population (1890), 1,058,910.

Nebraska City. The capital of Otoe County, Nebraska, situated on the Missouri 40 miles south of Omaha. Population (1890), 11,494.

Nebuchadnezzar (neb-ū-kad-nez'ar), or Nebuchadrezzar (-rez'ar). [Babylonian Nabû-kudduri-uçur, Nebo protect the boundary.] King of Babylonia 604–561 B. C., the chief ruler of the Neo-Babylonian empire, and one of the greatest monarchs of the ancient world. He distinguished himself as a general, while still crown prince, in the battle of Carchemish (which see) against the Egyptian king Necho II in 605 B. C. Succeeding to the throne on his father, Nabopolassar, died, and he was proclaimed king. His conquest of Jerusalem and Judea is described under Jehoiachin and Jehoiakim. Tyre he took after a siege of 13 years (585–573). He invaded Egypt in 572, defeated Hophra (Apries), and set Amasis on the throne in his place: an inscription of Nebuchadnezzar informs us that years afterward he had to subdue a rebellion of Amasis. Unlike most of the Assyrian conquerors, Nebuchadnezzar devoted his energies to the consolidation of his empire. The mighty canals and walls with which he surrounded Babylon, his magnificent palace (now represented by the ruins of al-Kasr, 'the castle'), the so-called "hanging gardens of Semiramis" which he had constructed for his Median wife Amytis (Amitu), his restoration of many temples, especially Esagila in Babylon and Ezida in Borsippa, are described in the article Babylon. A full description of the buildings he carried out is given by himself in a long inscription comprising 620 lines. There is no mention in the cuneiform inscriptions of Nebuchadnezzar's insanity as related in the Book of Daniel (iv. 26 ff.), but it has a certain parallel in the narrative of Abydenus (preserved by Eusebius), according to which the king once ascended the citadel of his palace and, inspired by a god, announced the fall of his empire.

Nebushazban (neb-ū-shaz'ban). [Babylonian Nabû-šēzib-anni, Nebo preserve me.] The name of the captain of the eunuchs of Nebuchadnezzar, mentioned in Jer. xxxix. 3.

Nebuzaradan (neb-ū-zar'a-dan). [Babylonian Nabû-zēr-iddina, Nebo has given offspring.] The captain of the body-guard of Nebuchadnezzar who in 586 B. C. was left by him in Judea to finish the work of destruction, and, according to Jer. lii. 30, came in 582 again to Judea and carried away 745 more Judean captives.

Neches (nech'ez) River. A river in eastern Texas which flows into Sabine Lake. Length, about 350 miles.

Necho (nē'kō), or Neku (nē'kū). An Egyptian king of the 26th dynasty (about 610–595 or 599 B. C.), son of Psammetichus I. He defeated Josiah at Megiddo about 608, and was defeated by Nebuchadnezzar at Carchemish about 606. He sent a Phenician expedition to circumnavigate Africa.

In B. C. 609 or 608 Neco, the son of Psamatik I., having recently ascended the Egyptian throne, made an expedition into Syria with the object of re-attaching to Egypt the entire tract between the "torrens Ægypti" and the Euphrates. At first success crowned his efforts: Josiah, king of Judah, who had ventured to oppose him, was defeated and slain at Megiddo; Palestine was conquered and placed under a tributary king (Jehoiakim); Syria was overrun, and the Egyptian dominion established over the entire region extending northward from Egypt to Amanus, and eastward to the Euphrates and Carchemish. This tract remained under the government of Neco for three years (B. C. 608–605). Phenicia must have submitted herself. Isaiahnson, Phenicia, p. 165.

Nechtansmere (neĕh'tanz-mēr). A place near Dunnichen, Forfar-shire, Scotland. Here, in 685, the Picts totally defeated the Northumbrians under Egfrith.

Neckar (nek'kär). A river in Würtemberg and Baden: the Roman Nicer. It is one of the chief tributaries of the Rhine, which it joins at Mannheim, and is noted for its romantic scenery and for the production of wines in its valley. Heidelberg and Tübingen are on it. Length, 222 miles; navigable for large craft to Heilbronn.

Neckar. One of the four circles of Würtemberg, situated in the northwestern part. Area, 1,284 square miles. Population (1890), 665,049.

Necker (nek'ĕr; F. pron. nā-kär'), Jacques. Born at Geneva, Sept. 30, 1732; died at Coppet, Switzerland, April 9, 1804. A French statesman and financier. He was for a time a banker at Paris; became director of the treasury in 1776, and director-general of the finances in 1777; was dismissed from office in 1781; was recalled to office in 1788; convened the States-General in 1789; was dismissed July 11, 1789; was recalled in 1789; and finally resigned in Sept., 1790. He published "Compte rendu" (1781), "L'Administration de Necker" (1791), "Pièces executif" (1792), "De la révolution française" (1796), etc.

Necker, Madame (Susanne Curchod). Born at Crassier, Switzerland, 1739; died at Coppet, Switzerland, May, 1794. The wife of J. Necker, a leader in literary circles. She was at one time engaged to the historian Gibbon.

Neckham (nek'am). Alexander. Born at St. Albans, Sept., 1157; died at Cirencester, 1217. An English scholar, foster-brother of Richard I. He was educated at St. Albans. In 1180 he was distinguished as a professor at Paris; in 1188 he became an Augustinian at Cirencester; and in 1213 he was elected abbot. He wrote scientific and grammatical treatises, Latin poems, theological works, commentaries on Aristotle, etc. His name was punned upon as Nequam.

Necklace, Diamond. See Diamond Necklace Affair.

Neco. See Necho.

Nedenäs, or Nedenes (nā'de-nās). A province in southern Norway. Area, 3,608 square miles. Population (1891), 81,043.

Nedim (ne-dēm'). See the extract.

> During the reign of Ahmed III. (1703–1730) flourished Nedim, the greatest of all the poets of the old Ottoman school. Nedim has a style that is entirely his own: it is altogether unlike that of any of his predecessors, whether Persian or Turkish, and no one has ever attempted to copy it. Through his ghazels, which are written with the most finished elegance in words of the truest harmony, sings a tone of sprightly gaiety and joyous lightheartedness, such as is not to be found in any other poet of his nation. His numerous kasidas, while they are no less graceful, are hardly less brilliant than those of Nefi, and are at the same time in truer taste and less burdened with obscure and far-fetched conceits. Little is known regarding his life, save that he resided at Constantinople, where the Grand Vezir, Ibrahim Pa-ha, appointed him custodian of the library which he had founded, and that he was still alive in 1727. Poole, Story of Turkey, p. 318.

Nedjed (ned'jed), or Nejd (nejd). A large region in central Arabia, lying between Shomer on the north and Dahna on the south. The surface is generally a plateau. It is inhabited chiefly by Wahhabees. See Arabia.

Ned Myers. A novel by Cooper, published in 1843.

Needham (nēd'am). A town in Norfolk County, Massachusetts, 11 miles west-southwest of Boston. Population (1890), 3,035.

Needles (nē'dlz), The. A group of three pointed rocks in the English Channel, west of the Isle of Wight.

Neefe (nā'fe), Christian Gottlieb. Born at Chemnitz, Feb. 5, 1748: died Jan. 26, 1798. A German musician. His principal claim to notice is that he was the instructor of Beethoven at Bonn.

Neenah (nē'nä). A city in Winnebago County, Wisconsin, situated on Fox River 12 miles north of Oshkosh. Population (1890), 5,083.

Neer (nār), Aart van der. Born about 1619: died after 1692. A Dutch landscape-painter.

Neer, Eglon Hendrik van der. Born at Amsterdam, 1643: died at Düsseldorf, Prussia, May 3, 1703. A Dutch painter, son of Aart van der Neer.

Neerwinden (nār'vin-den). A village in the province of Liège, Belgium, 31 miles east by south of Brussels. It is noted for two battles: here, July 29, 1693, the French under Luxembourg defeated the Allies under William III. of England (this is also called the battle of Landen); and here, March 18, 1793, the Austrians under the Prince of Coburg defeated the French under Dumouriez.

Nees von Esenbeck (nās fon ā'zen-bek), Christian Gottfried. Born in the Odenwald, Hesse, Feb. 14, 1776: died at Breslau, Prussia, March 16, 1858. A German botanist and zoölogist. He became professor of botany at Erlangen in 1818, at Bonn in 1819, and at Breslau in 1831. For political reasons he was deprived of his office in 1852. Among his works are "Handbuch der Botanik" (1820–21), and works on entomology, philosophy, etc.

Nefert (nē'fert). [Egypt., 'good' or 'beautiful.'] An Egyptian queen, wife of Amenemhat II. A life-size statue of her, in black granite, was found in the ruins of Tanis, Lower Egypt.

Nefert and Ra-Hotep (rä-hō'tep). Two remarkable statues of early Egyptian art, in the museum at Gizeh, Egypt. The figures are seated, carved in limestone, painted, and with inlaid eyes of glass and enamel, the effect being strangely lifelike. The prince wears a simple loin-cloth, the princess a close-fitting white garment with an elaborate necklace and a diadem. The statues came from the vestibule of a tomb at Meidum.

Nefertari (nē-fer-tä'ri) Aahmes. [Egypt., 'beautiful wife of Aahmes.'] An Egyptian queen, wife of Aahmes I. Her mummy-case, "one of the largest and most magnificent ever discovered," is in the museum at Gizeh.

> Not only in the rock-caves of Túrah and Massaarah, opposite to Memphis, but also on a number of public monuments in the interior of the sepulchral chambers of the Theban Necropolis, the name of this queen is frequently preserved, surrounded by laudatory inscriptions. Long after her decease, this great ancestress of the New Empire was venerated as the good queen, and her image was placed beside those of the eternal inhabitants of the Egyptian heaven. Brugsch, Egypt under the Pharaohs, p. 131.

Nefi (nef'ē). See the extract.

> During the reign of Ahmed I. (1603–1607), arose the second great light of old Turkish poetry. This was Nefi of Erzerum, who is in much esteem for the brilliancy of his kasidas, or eulogies, as Fuzûli is for the tenderness of his ghazels. Like him, he elaborated a style for himself, which found many imitators, the most successful of whom was Sabri. Unfortunately for himself, Nefi was an able satirist: his scathing pen drew down upon him the enmity of certain great men, who prevailed upon Sultan Murád IV. to sanction his execution (1635). Poole, Story of Turkey, p. 315.

Negapatam (neg-a-pa-täm'). A seaport in the district of Tanjore, Madras, British India, situated in lat. 10° 45′ N., long. 79° 51′ E. Population (1891), 59,221.

Négrier (nā-grē-ā'), François Oscar de. Born at Belfort, 1839. A French general, distinguished in the operations in Tongking and Annam 1885.

Negritos (ne-grē'tōz). A diminutive dark-skinned negro-like race found in the Philippine Islands (of which they seem to have been the original inhabitants), and in New Caledonia, etc., according to some authorities. The average height of the Negritos of the Philippine Islands is about 4 feet 8 inches. Also Negrillos.

Negro, Rio. See Rio Negro.

Negro race. A race of which the physical characteristics are a long and strong skeleton, long and thick skull, prognathic jaws, skin from dark brown to black, woolly hair, thick lips, and a broad and flattened nose. It occupies in a compact mass the African continent south of the Sahara. The brown races of South Africa, the pygmies of central Africa, and the red-brown races of Sudan, who live in the same area, are comparatively few in number, or are intimately mixed with the negro race. There is no racial difference between the Bantu, speaking languages derived from one mother tongue, and the negroes of Upper Guinea and the Sudan, who speak unconnected languages; nor is there much difference in customs. The non-Bantu languages of the Upper Guinea and Sudan negroes are called, in this work, the Nigritic branch, and this word is also applied to the tribes. The negroes of South, Central, and South America have been deported from Africa. The Papuans and Nigritos of Australasia, having all or most of the characteristics of the African negroes, are classed by some with these, by some apart. See African ethnography and languages (under Africa), Bantu, and Hottentot-Bushman.

Negropont. The modern name of Eubœa.

Negros (nā'grōs). One of the Philippine Islands, situated north of Mindanao. Length, about 130 miles. Population, over 200,000.

Nehavend (nā-hā-vend'). A place in Persia, 50 miles south of Hamadan, noted for the battle of 641 (642?), in which the Saracens totally defeated the Persians and overthrew the Persian kingdom.

Nehemiah (nē-he-mī'ä). [Heb., 'comforted by Yahveh.'] A Hebrew cup-bearer of Artaxerxes Longimanus of Persia, appointed governor of Judea 444 B. C. He rebuilt the walls of Jerusalem, and restored the national worship. The authorship of a part of the Book of Nehemiah is ascribed to him.

Nehemiah, Book of. A book of the Old Testament, written probably in part by Nehemiah. See Neleus.

The book of Nehemiah, or, as we have now learned to call it, in accordance with the Hebrew usage, the joint book of Ezra and Nehemiah, which recall probability was also our book with Chronicles, names down the list of high priests as far as Jaddua, who was in office at the time of Alexander (Neh. xii. 11). The book, therefore, was written at the earliest, at the very end of the Persian period, though it incorporates edicts and documents, such as the autobiography of Ezra and the memoir of Nehemiah. W. R. Smith, O. T. in the Jewish Ch., p. 140.

Neher (nā'her), Bernhard von. Born at Biberach, Würtemberg, Jan. 16, 1806; died at Stuttgart, Jan. 17, 1886. A German historical painter.

Neidhart von Reuenthal (nīt'hārt fon roi'en-tāl). Place and date of birth unknown: died at Vienna, date unknown. A Middle High German lyric poet of the 13th century. He was a Bavarian knight, took part in the crusade of Leopold II. of Austria 1217–19, and subsequently lived at Vienna at the court of Duke Frederick. His principal poems are dance-songs. He is the founder of the popular lyric poetry of the courts—poetry, namely, that found its material in the rude life and manners of the peasants, who were held up to the ridicule of the nobles. His poems were published at Leipsic in 1858.

Neilgherry Hills. See Nilgiri Hills.

Neill (nēl), Edward Duffield. Born at Philadelphia, Aug. 9, 1823. An American author. He was consul at St. Paul, Minn., Sept. 26, 1893. An American historian. His works include "English Colonization of America" (1871) and other works on American colonial history, "Concise History of Minnesota" (1887), etc.

Neilson (nēl'son), Adelaide. Born at Leeds, Yorkshire, March 3, 1848: died at Paris, France, Aug. 14, 1880. A noted English actress. Her real name was Elizabeth Ann Brown, and, her mother having subsequently married a Mr. Bland, she was known as Lizzie Bland. At the age of 15 she made her first ballet. In 1870 she made a conspicuous success as Amy Robsart in London, and by 1873 she was the acknowledged queen of the English stage. In 1876 she was equally successful at Booth's Theater in New York. She made four visits to America, her last appearance there being on May 24, 1880.

Neilson (nēl'son), James Branmont. Born near Glasgow, June 22, 1792: died at Queen's Hill, Kirkcudbrightshire, Jan. 18, 1865. A British engineer and inventor. He invented the use of the hot blast in smelting-furnaces.

Neipperg (nīp'perg), Count Adam Adalbert von. Born April 8, 1775: died Feb. 22, 1829. An Austrian general and diplomatist. He married Maria Louisa after the divorce of Napoleon (1821).

Neisse (nis'se). The name of three tributaries of the Oder, principally in Silesia. (a) Glatzer Neisse, joining the Oder 35 miles southeast of Breslau. Length, 120 miles. (b) Wuthende ('Furious') Neisse, joining the Oder on the north boundary of Breslau. (c) Lausitzer or Görlitzer Neisse, joining the Oder 26 miles south of Frankfort-on-the-Oder. Length, 140 miles.

Neisse. A fortified city in the province of Silesia, Prussia, situated at the junction of the Biela and Glatzer Neisse, 46 miles south by east of Breslau. It was formerly the capital of an ancient principality of Neisse: repulsed the Hussites in 1428; was taken by Frederick the Great in 1741, and made a strong fortress: was unsuccessfully besieged by the Austrians in 1807, and was taken by the French June 16, 1807. Population (1890), 23,444.

Neith (nē'ith), or Nit (nēt). [Gr. Νηίθ, Egypt. Net.] In Egyptian mythology, a lofty personification of the female principle, the mother of the sun, unbegotten. She was the chief divinity of Sais, single, supreme, and self-producing. She was identified by the Greeks with Athene. She was represented as a woman wearing the crown of Lower Egypt.

Neiva, or Neyva (nā'ē-vä). A town in the Republic of Colombia, situated on the Magdalena 125 miles southwest of Bogotá. Population, about 8,000.

Nekayah, Princess. The sister of Rasselas, in Johnson's work of that name.

Nekrassoff, or Nekrasoff (nek-ra'sof), Nikolai Alexeivitch. Born in the government of Yaroslaff, Russia, Nov. 22 (O. S.), 1821: died at St. Petersburg, Dec. 27 (O. S.), 1877. A distinguished Russian poet. He was educated at the cadet school at St. Petersburg. He was editor of "The Contemporary" and "The Annals of the Country." In 1840 he published "Dreams and Elves," a small volume of poems, most of which had already appeared in "The Annals of the Country" and other journals. His poems are published in 6 volumes. Among them are "Red-nosed Frost" (1865), "To Whom is Life in Russia Worth Living" (the last-named of which, owing to the censor, was not published till 1881), and "Russian Women." He was essentially a poet of the people.

Nélaton (nā-lā-tôn'), Auguste. Born at Paris, June 17, 1807: died at Paris, Sept. 21, 1873. A noted French surgeon, professor in the medical faculty of the University of Paris 1851–67. His chief work is "Éléments de pathologie chirurgicale" ("Elements of Surgical Pathology," 1844–60).

Neleus (nē'lūs). [Gr. Νηλεύς.] In Greek mythology, a son of Poseidon and Tyro, founder and king of Pylus in Messenia. He was the father of Nestor.

Nellore (ne-lōr'), or Nellur (ne-lōr'). 1. A district in Madras, British India, intersected by lat. 14° 30′ N., long. 80° E. Area, 8,739 square miles. Population (1881), 1,220,256.—2. The capital of the district of Nellore, situated on the Pennair 95 miles north by west of Madras. Population (1881), 27,505.

Nelson (nel'son). A name given to the river Saskatchewan in the lower part of its course.

Nelson. A seaport at the northern end of South Island, New Zealand, situated in lat. 41° 15′ S., long. 173° 17′ E. (lighthouse). Population (1889), 4,783.

Nelson, Horatio, first Viscount Nelson. Born at Burnham-Thorpe, Norfolk, England, Sept. 29, 1758; died on board the Victory at Trafalgar, Oct. 21, 1805. A celebrated English admiral. He entered the navy in 1770 and was made post-captain at the age of twenty-one, serving in the American war. At the declaration of war with France in 1793, he was made captain of the Agamemnon in the Mediterranean, serving first under Lord Howard and afterward under Admiral Hotham. On Feb. 14, 1797, under Admiral Jervis (later Lord St. Vincent), he fought in the battle off Cape St. Vincent. In May, 1798, he was sent by Lord St. Vincent to intercept Napoleon's expedition to Egypt. In this he failed, but destroyed the French fleet at anchor in the harbor of Aboukir, Aug. 1-2. This engagement is called "the battle of the Nile." He retired to Naples, where he became involved in political complications and in an intrigue with the wife of Sir William Hamilton, British envoy to Naples. In 1800 he returned to England and was made vice-admiral and a peer. The battle of Copenhagen was fought April 2, 1801, in order to destroy the coalition of the northern powers known as the (second) Armed Neutrality. Nelson was made a viscount after Copenhagen. The French fleet under Admiral Villeneuve left Toulon in March, 1805, and sailed to the West Indies with the intention of drawing off the English fleet and returning to support Napoleon's projected invasion of England. Nelson followed, and, after Napoleon's plan had been thwarted by the hesitancy of Villeneuve, fought the French fleet off Cape Trafalgar, Oct. 21, 1805. He was killed in this battle, and was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral, Jan. 9, 1806.

Nelson, Samuel. Born at Hebron, N. Y., Nov. 10, 1792; died at Cooperstown, N. Y., Dec. 13, 1873. An American jurist. He was associate justice of the Supreme Court of the State of New York 1831–37, and chief justice 1837–45; associate justice of the United States Supreme Court 1845–72; and a member of the Joint high commission to settle the Alabama claims in 1871.

Nelson, William. Born at Maysville, Ky., 1825; killed at Louisville, Ky., Sept. 29, 1862. An American general in the Civil War. He entered the navy in 1840, and was promoted lieutenant-commander in 1861. At the beginning of the Civil War he organized camps in Kentucky for mustering Union soldiers. He was made brigadier-general in 1861, commanded the second division of Buell's army at the battle of Shiloh; and afterward took command of Louisville. He was made major-general of volunteers in July, 1862. He was shot and killed in an altercation with General Jefferson C. Davis.

Nelson Monument. A Corinthian column of granite, 145 feet high, on a square pedestal, standing in Trafalgar Square, London. It bears a statue of the admiral, 17 feet high, and on the sides of the pedestal are bronze reliefs relating his chief exploits. Around the column are placed four colossal reposing lions in bronze, by Landseer.

Nemausus (ne-ma'sus). The Roman name of Nimes.

Nemea (nē'mē-ā). [Gr. Νεμέα.] In ancient geography, a valley in Argolis, Greece, 11 miles southwest of Corinth. It is noted as the scene of the Nemean games, and in legend as the haunt of the Nemean lion.

Nemean games (nē'mē-an or nē-mē'an gāmz). One of the four great national festivals of the ancient Greeks (the others being the Olympian, Pythian, and Isthmian games). These games were celebrated at Nemea in the second and fourth years of each Olympiad, near the temple of the Nemean Zeus, some (doric) columns of which are still standing. According to the mythological story, the games were instituted in memory of the death of the young hero Archemorus or Opheltes by the bite of a serpent, as the expedition of "the Seven against Thebes" was passing through the place. The victor's garland at the Nemean games was made of parsley.

Nemesianus (nē'me-si-ā'nus). Marcus Aurelius Olympius. Born probably at Carthage; lived at the close of the 3d century. A Roman poet. Fragments of his "Cynegetica" have been edited by Haupt (1838).

In the time of Carus and his sons, M. Aurelius Olympius Nemesianus of Carthage wrote his didactic poem on the chase (Cynegetica), the first 325 lines of which have come down to us. They exhibit fluency, ease, and command of language in the traditional style, the technique being in the main the same as in the four wordy eclogues by this author, in which he has taken as his pattern Calpurnius's bucolic essay, but proves considerably inferior even to this very mediocre model.
Teuffel and Schwabe, Hist. of Roman Lit. (tr. by Warr), (II. 289.

Nemesis (nem'e-sis). [Gr. Νέμεσις.] In Greek mythology, a goddess personifying allotment, or the divine distribution to every man of his previous share of fortune, good and bad. It was her especial function to see that the proper proportion of individual prosperity was preserved, and that any one who became too prosperous, or was too much uplifted by his prosperity, should be reduced or punished: she thus came to be regarded as the goddess of divine retribution. Sometimes Nemesis was represented as winged and with the wheel of fortune, or borne in a chariot drawn by griffins, and confounded with Adrasteia, the goddess of the inevitable.

Nemesius (nē-mē'si-us). [Gr. Νεμέσιος.] Lived in the last part of the 4th century. A theologian, bishop of Emesa: author of a Greek treatise "On the Nature of Man."

Nemetes (nē-mē'tēz). [L. (Cæsar) Nemetes, Gr. (Ptolemy) Νεμῆτοι: of Gallic origin.] A German tribe, first mentioned by Cæsar as in the army of Ariovistus. They were situated at the left side of the middle Rhine, east of the Vosges, in the region about Spires, where they still remained after the defeat of Ariovistus (B. C. 58). They were probably merged ultimately in the Alamanni.

Nemi (nā'mē), Lake of. A small lake 17 miles southeast of Rome, noted for its beauty: the ancient Lacus Nemorensis. It is an extinct crater in the Alban Mountains.

Nemo (nē'mō). [L., 'no one.'] The signature of Hablot Knight Browne to the first two plates illustrating the "Pickwick Papers," which he afterward changed to "Phiz."

Nemours (ne-mör'). A town in the department of Seine-et-Marne, France, situated on the Loing 45 miles south-southeast of Paris. Population (1891), 4,507.

Nemours, Duc de (Gaston de Foix). Born in 1489: died April 11, 1512. A celebrated French general. He was the son of Jean de Foix, vicomte de Narbonne, and Marie d'Orleans, sister of Louis XII. He was created Duke of Nemours in 1505. In 1512 he conducted a brilliant campaign against the Spaniards in Italy, and was killed in the pursuit after a great victory won by him at Ravenna, April 11, 1512.

Nemours, Duc de (Prince Louis Charles Philippe Raphael d'Orléans). Born at Paris, Oct. 25, 1814. The second son of Louis Philippe. He served as general in the French army, and took part in the expeditions against Constantine (Algeria) 1836–37. From 1840 to 1871 he lived in England, and from 1870 to 1889 in France. He was expelled from the army in 1886. He lived subsequently in Belgium.

Nenagh (ne'nā), local pron. (ne'nach). A town in County Tipperary, Ireland, situated 22 miles northeast of Limerick. Population (1891), 4,722.

Nennius (nen'i-us). The reputed author of the "Historia Britonum," written probably in the 9th century.

Neoplatonists (nē-ō-plā'tō-nists). ['New Platonists.'] The believers in a system of philosophical and religious doctrines and principles which originated in Alexandria with Ammonius Saccas in the 3d century, and was developed by Plotinus, Porphyry, Iamblichus, Hypatia, Proclus, and others in the 3d, 4th, and 5th centuries. The system was composed of elements of Platonism and Oriental beliefs, and in its later development was influenced by the theology of Philo Judæus, and modified by Christianity. Its leading representative was Plotinus. His views were popularized by Porphyry and modified in the direction of mysticism by Iamblichus. Considerable sympathy with Neoplatonism in its earlier stages was shown by several eminent Christian writers, especially in Alexandria, such as St. Clement, Origen, etc. The last Neoplatonic schools were suppressed in the 6th century.

Neoptolemus (nē-op-tol'ē-mus), or Pyrrhus (pir'us). [Gr. Νεοπτόλεμος.] In Greek legend, a son of Achilles and Deidameia (or, according to some, Iphigenia): one of the heroes of the Trojan war. He was one of the band which was concealed in the wooden horse by means of which the city was captured, slew Priam, and married Andromache, the wife of Hector. He was later in Epirus, where he carried off Lanassa, a granddaughter of Hercules, and plundered the temple of Apollo at Delphi. He married Hermione. At Delphi he was worshiped as a hero, and was said to have protected that shrine from the Gothi.

Neoptolemus. Killed about 321 B. C. A Macedonian general in the service of Alexander the Great.

Neosho (nē-ō'shō). A river in southeastern Kansas and Indian Territory, which joins the Arkansas near Fort Gibson. Length, 300–400 miles.

Neot (nē'ot or nēt), Saint. A hermit of the 9th century, whose life, written by a monk of the abbey of St. Neot, is thought to have furnished material for the history of Alfred.

The St. Neot mentioned in this argument was a kinsman of King Alfred's who, first bred to arms, renounced the world, taught at Glastonbury, visited Rome, and desiring pious solitude became a hermit in the woods of Cornwall. After seven years he visited the Pope again, returned to his hermitage, converted it into a small monastic house of which he was the first abbot, where also he is said to have been sometimes visited by Alfred, and died in 877. In 974 his bones were carried to the newly-founded monastery of St. Neot's, Huntingdonshire, and after that date his life was written. Morley, English Writers, II. 295.

Nepal (ne-pâl'), or Nipal (nē-pâl'), or Nepaul (ne-pâl'). A country in Asia, situated mainly on the southern slope of the Himalaya system. Capital, Khatmandu. It is bounded by Tibet on the north, Sikhim on the east, and British India on the south and west. It is governed by a maharaja and prime minister. The ruling people are the Ghurkas. The religion is Buddhism (blended with Hinduism); Hindustani, a dialect of Hindi, referred to in the "Birds" by Aristophanes.

Nepomuk (nā'pō-mūk), Saint John of. Born at Pomuk, Bohemia: thrown into the Moldau in 1393 (in legend 1383). A Bohemian ecclesiastic, patron saint of Bohemia.

Nepos (nē'pos), Cornelius. Born probably at Verona, Italy; lived in the 1st century B. C. A Roman historian, a friend of Cicero. See the extract.

His life may be said to fall between 655 99 and 730/24. Besides erotic poems, three books of Chronica were his earliest work, but he seems also to have written a geographical treatise. His other writings show that he was influenced by Varro in the more direct of the literary of manners and customs and had a biographical and moral tendency. In this way he wrote five books of Exempla, and the elaborate biographies of Cato the Elder and Cicero, and especially his last and most comprehensive work, "De viris illustribus," in at least sixteen books, in which the lives of Romans and foreigners were placed in parallel juxtaposition. The parts of it which we possess, the work "De excellentibus ducibus exterarum gentium," and the biographies of Cato and of Atticus (being an extract from his work "De historicis latinis"), are the more valuable for their lucidity of arrangement, unpretentious tone, and fair and sympathetic judgments; but they hardly attain even a moderate level of accuracy and thoroughness as historical essays, and are equally inferior in style, owing to the frequency of popular and colloquial idioms.
Teuffel and Schwabe, Hist. of Rom. Lit. (tr. by Warr), (II. 341.

Nepos, Julius. Killed at Salona, Dalmatia, 480. Emperor of the West 474–475. He was appointed emperor by Leo I., emperor of the East. He was defeated and deposed by Orestes, who raised his own son Romulus Augustulus to the throne.

Neptune (nep'tūn). [From L. Neptunus, a seagod.] 1. In Roman mythology, the god of the sea, who came to be identified by the Romans themselves with the Greek Poseidon, whose attributes were transferred by the poets to the ancient Latin deity. In art Neptune is usually represented as a bearded man of stately presence, with the trident as his chief attribute, and the horse and the dolphin as symbols.

2. The outermost known planet of the solar system, and the third in volume and mass, but invisible to the naked eye. It was discovered in the autumn of 1846. Uranus, the planet next to Neptune, revolving about the sun in 84 years, was discovered in 1781, but observations of it as a fixed star were scattered through the 18th century. In 1821 Bouvard found that the observations could not be satisfied by any theory based on the gravitation of known bodies, and hinted at an undiscovered planet. During the following 20 years further observations satisfied astronomers that such a planet must exist. To find its position was the problem which two mathematicians, J. C. Adams in England and U. J. Leverrier in France, set themselves to solve by mathematics. The calculations of Leverrier assigned to it a position within the boundaries of a not very large region. In consequence of the indications of Adams, the astronomer Challis observed the star Aug. 4 and 12, 1846, but, neglecting to work up his observations, failed to recognize it as a planet; while, in consequence of the indications of Leverrier, Galle of Berlin discovered Neptune Sept. 23, 1846. A satellite to Neptune was detected in Oct., 1846, by Lassell: its period of revolution is 5d. 21h. 3m., and its maximum elongation 18″. The name Neptune was conferred by Encke. The diameter of the planet is 37,000 miles; its distance from the sun is about 2,800,000,000 miles; and its period of revolution is about 164 years.

Nequam. See Neckham.

Nera (nā'rā). A small river in Italy, a tributary of the Tiber. Terni is situated on it.

Nereids (nē'rē-idz). In Greek mythology, seanymphs, the daughters of Nereus (whence the name) and Doris, generally spoken of as fifty in number. The most famous among them were Amphitrite, Thetis, and Galatea. The Nereids were beautiful maidens helpful to voyagers, and constituted the main body of the female, as the Tritons did of the male, followers of Poseidon or Neptune. They were imagined as dancing, singing, playing musical instruments, wooed by the Tritons, and passing in long processions over the sea seated on hippogrops and other seamonsters. Monuments of ancient art represent them lightly draped or nude, in poses characterized by undulating lines harmonizing with those of the ocean, and often riding on sea-monsters of fantastic forms.

Nereid Friezes. Four friezes from the Nereid monument at Xanthus in Lycia, now in the British Museum. The widest frieze represents a battle between Greeks and Asiatics; the others represent episodes of war, the chase, banquet, and sacrifice.

Nergal (nėr'gal). One of the twelve great gods of the Babylonians and Assyrians, mentioned in 2 Ki. xvii. 30 as the deity of Cuthah, a statement fully confirmed by the cuneiform inscriptions. See Cuthah. He is primitively, like Adar, the sun-god in his destructive aspect. This is supposed to be expressed in his name, Nergal, Ner-gal, "ner = adj, lord of the great city,' i. e. the grave. Both were, however, chiefly considered as the divinities of war and the chase. Nergal was represented under the symbol of colossal lions, which guarded the entrance of the Assyro-Babylonian temples and palaces.

Nergalsharezer (nėr'gal-sha-rē'zėr). [Babylonian Nergal-shar-uçur, Nergal protect the king.] 1. The name of a Babylonian general (Jer. xxxix. 3) and of a chief of the Magi (Jer. xxxix. 3, 13). —2. A Babylonian king who ruled 560–556 B. C., between Evil Merodach and Nabonidus. He was son-in-law of Nebuchadnezzar.

Nero (nē'rō) (originally Lucius Domitius Ahenobarbus, later Nero Claudius Cæsar Drusus Germanicus), Born at Antium, Italy, Dec. 15, 37 A. D.: committed suicide near Rome, June 9, 68. Roman emperor 54–68, son of Domitius Ahenobarbus and Agrippina (daughter of Germanicus). He was adopted by his stepfather, the emperor Claudius, in 50, and in 53 married Octavia, the daughter of Claudius by Messalina. In 54 Claudius was poisoned by Agrippina, who caused her son to be proclaimed to the exclusion of Britannicus, the son of Claudius. His former tutors, the philosopher Seneca and Burrus, commander of the prætorian cohorts, were placed in charge of the government, and the early years of his reign were marked, on the whole, by clemency and justice. He caused his rival Britannicus to be removed by poison in 55. In 59 he procured the assassination of his mother. As to control he had become impatient. Burrus died in 62, whereupon Seneca retired from public life. Freed from the restraint of his former advisers, he gave free rein to a naturally tyrannical and cruel disposition. He divorced Octavia in order to marry Poppæa, and shortly afterward put Octavia to death (62). Poppæa ultimately died from the effects of a kick administered by her brutal husband. Having been accused of kindling the fire which in 64 destroyed a large part of Rome, he sought to divert attention from himself by ordering a persecution of the Christians, whom he accused of having caused the conflagration. He put Seneca to death in 65, and 66–68 visited Greece, where he competed for the prizes as a musician and charioteer in the religious festivals. He was overthrown by a revolt under Galba, and stabbed himself to death with the assistance of his secretary.

But the imperial Reign of Terror was limited to a comparatively small number of families in Rome. The provinces were undoubtedly better governed than in the later days of the Republic, and even in Rome itself the common people strewed flowers on the grave of Nero.

Hodgkin, Italy and her Invaders, I. 6.

Nero, Caius Claudius. A Roman consul 207 B. C. He marched against Hasdrubal, and (with Livius) defeated him in the battle of the Metaurus in 207.

Nestorians (nes-tō'ri-anz). 1. The followers of Nestorius. They denied the hypostatic union of two natures in one person in Christ, holding that he possesses two distinct personalities, the union between which is merely moral. After the Council of Ephesus the Nestorians obtained possession of the theological schools of Edessa, Nisibis, and Seleucia, and were driven by imperial edicts into Persia, where they firmly established themselves. Later they spread to India, Bactria, and as far as China. About the 12th century part of their churches perished under the persecutions of Timur, and in the 16th century a large part of the remainder joined the Roman Catholics. These are called Chaldæans. See def. 2.

2. A modern Christian body in Persia and Turkey, the remnant of the once powerful Nestorian denomination. They number about 140,000, are subject to a patriarch (the patriarch of Urumiah) and 18 bishops (see sees and sees and sub-sees, administer communion in both kinds, and have no purgatory. Another community of Nestorian origin still exists on the Malabar coast of India, but since the middle of the 17th century these are said to have become Monophysites.

Netherlands (neth'er-landz). The Low Countries: Holland and Belgium. The former now retains the name Netherlands. See below.

Netherlands, D. Nederlanden (nā'der-länden), G. Niederlande (nē'der-län-de), F. Pays-Bas (pā-ē'bä'): often called Holland (hol'and). A kingdom of western Europe. Capitals, Amsterdam and The Hague. It is bounded by the North Sea on the west and north, Prussia on the east, and Belgium on the south. The surface is generally flat, the land having in many parts been reclaimed from the sea. The chief rivers are the Rhine, Meuse, and Scheldt. The leading occupations are commerce, raising of live stock, agriculture, and manufactures. The kingdom has 11 provinces: North Holland, South Holland, Zealand, North Brabant, Utrecht, Limburg, Gelderland, Overyssel, Drenthe, Groningen, and Friesland. The government is a hereditary constitutional monarchy administered by a king and States-General composed of an upper chamber of 50 and a lower chamber of 100 members. The inhabitants, generally called Dutch, are chiefly of Low German race (three branches—Frankish, Saxon, and Friesian). The prevailing language is Dutch, and the religious Dutch Reformed and Roman Catholic. The chief colonial possessions are the Dutch East Indies (including Java, the Moluccas, parts of Borneo, New Guinea, Sumatra, and Celebes, and smaller islands) and the Dutch West Indies (including Dutch Guiana and Curaçon with its dependencies). The region was inhabited by various German peoples in Roman times. In the middle ages it was divided among Brabant, Flanders, Gelderland, Holland, Zealand, and other duchies, counthips, etc. It was united with Burgundy by the end of the 15th century, passed to the Hapsburg family in 1477, and thence later to Spain. The following are the leading later incidents and events: Reformation introduced under Charles V.; outbreak of the revolution (under William of Orange; Spanish leader, the Duke of Alva), 1567; pacification of Ghent, 1576; northern provinces united in the union of Utrecht, 1579; war concluded, 1609; war renewed, 1621; recognition of the republic acknowledged, 1648; country at its greatest prosperity, middle of 17th century; allied with England and Sweden against France, 1668; allied with England under William III., 1689–1702; conquered by France, 1794–95; erected into the Batavian Republic, 1795; made a kingdom under Louis Bonaparte, 1806; annexed by France, 1810; union with Belgium in the kingdom of the Netherlands, 1815; revolution in Belgium, 1830; end of the war, 1833; treaty with Belgium, 1839. The constitution was revised in 1887. Area, 12,648 square miles. Population (1893), 4,621,744. Area of colonial possessions, 766,137 square miles; approximate population, 35,000,000.

Netherlands, Austrian. The name given to the Spanish Netherlands after their cession to Austria in 1713–14. There was an unsuccessful revolt in 1789–90. The provinces were conquered by France in 1794, and ceded to France in 1797. See Belgium.

Neveu de Rameau (nė-vė' dė rä-mō'), Le. [F., 'The Nephew of Rameau.'] A work by Diderot, written about 1670, but not published till 1805. It was translated into German by Goethe in 1805; and in 1860 Jules Janin wrote a sequel in which he explains the somewhat enigmatical hero, a brilliant Bohemian hanger-on.

The strangest of all Diderot's attempts in prose fiction — if it is to be called a fiction and not a dramatic study — is the so-called 'Neveu de Rameau,' in which, in the guise of a dialogue between himself and a hanger-on of society (or rather a monologue of the latter), the follies and vices, not merely of the time, but of human nature itself, are exposed with a masterly hand, and in a manner wonderfully original and piquant.

Newcomes (nū'kumz), The. A novel by Thackeray, published in 1854. The character of Colonel Newcome is one of touching simplicity.

The old colonel is ruined by speculation, and in his ruin is brought to accept the alms of the brotherhood of the Grey Friars. . . . He dons the gown, . . . and occupies the single room, and eats the doled bread, and among his poor brothers sits in the chapel of his order. The description is perhaps as fine as anything that Thackeray ever did. The gentleman is still the gentleman, with all the pride of gentry; but not the less is he the humble bedesman, aware that he is living upon charity, not made to grovel by any sense of shame, but knowing that, though his normal pride may be left to him, an outward demeanour of humility is befitting. And then he dies. "At the usual evening hour the chapel bell began to toll, and Thomas Newcome's hands outside the bed feebly beat time — and just as the last bell struck, a peculiar sweet smile shone over his face, and he lifted up his head a little, and quickly said, 'Adsum' — and fell back. It was the word we used at school when names were called; and, lo, he whose heart was as that of a little child had answered to his name, and stood in the presence of his Maker!"

Trollope, Thackeray.

Newfoundland (oftenest nū-fund-land'; on the island itself generally nū-fund-land'; also nū'fund-land), [Orig. New-found land; NL. Terra Nova, F. Terre Neuve, new land.] An island forming a British colonial possession, situated east of British North America. Capital, St. John's. It is bounded on the north by the Strait of Belle Isle (separating it from Labrador), on the east and south by the Atlantic, and on the west by the Gulf of St. Lawrence. It contains the peninsulas of Avalon in the southeast and Petit Nord in the north. The coast is greatly indented, the largest inlet on the west by the many lakes. The chief occupation is the fisheries: the island has the largest cod-fisheries in the world, and has also seal, herring, salmon, and lobster fisheries. It contains productive copper-mines. It is a crown colony, the government being vested in a governor, executive council, legislative council, and house of assembly. It was discovered by John Cabot in 1497; the colony was commenced in the beginning of the 16th century: and the first important settlement was made by the English under Calvert in 1621. There were feuds between English and French fishermen, and by the treaty of 1713 Newfoundland was given to England. Representative government was granted in 1832, and the present form of government was established in 1855. French rights on the coast, granted in 1713 and 1783, have been a frequent subject of dispute. Area, 42,200 square miles. Population (1891), 197,934.

New France (frans). The region in North America claimed and in part settled by France. By 1650 it included the basins of the St. Lawrence and of the Great Lakes, with Labrador and the present Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and part of Maine. Contests with England arose, and four wars ensued — King William's, Queen Anne's, King George's, and the French and Indian. Quebec and Montreal were first captured by Wolfe in 1759. New France, with Louisiana added, comprised the St. Lawrence and Great Lakes basins, with the Mississippi basin, though settlements were confined to a few points on the lakes and rivers. The latter (which see) had been ceded to England in 1713. The result of the treaty of 1763 was to cede all the region east of the Mississippi to England, and that west of the Mississippi to Spain.

New Galicia. See Nueva Galicia.

Newgate (nū'gāt). The western gate of London wall by which the Watling street left the city. It was at first called Westgate, but later Chancellor's gate, in the reign of Henry I. Chancellor's gate was rebuilt and called Newgate. At about the same time the county of Middlesex was given to the citizens of London, and Newgate was used for prisoners from that county. The use of this locality for a prison continues until the present day, although now only a house of detention is located here. Newgate always had an unsavory reputation, and resisted all efforts at reform. These began as early as the time of Richard Whittington, who left a large sum for its improvement. The prison was burned during the Gordon riots in 1780, and was rebuilt in 1782. Archer, Letter.

Since executions have ceased to be carried out at Tyburn, they have taken place here. The late amelioration in the condition of prisoners in Newgate is in a great measure due to the exertions of Mrs. Fry, who has left a terrible account of their state even in 1838. Hare, London, I. 166.

Newgate Calendar. A biographical record of the most notorious criminals confined in Newgate.

New Georgia (jôr'jiä). The former name for Vancouver Island and the Pacific coast opposite it.

New Granada (gra-nä'dä), Sp. Nueva Granada (nō-ā'vä grä-nä'thä). An earlier name of the South American country now called Colombia (which see). It was given by the conqueror Quesada (1538), in remembrance of his native province of Granada: at that time the term included only the highlands about Bogotá. Under the colonial presidents (1564–1718) and viceroys (1719–1810) it embraced nearly the present territory of Colombia, except from 1710 to 1722, when Quito (the present Ecuador) was annexed to it. The official title under the viceroys was Nuevo Reino de Granada (New Kingdom of Granada). After the revolution New Granada was retained as a collective name for the provinces composing the old viceroyalty, though they were merged in the republic of Colombia (including also Venezuela and Quito) from 1819 to 1831. In the latter year Venezuela and Quito separated, and the Republic of New Granada was formed. In 1861, on the adoption of a federal constitution, the name was changed to United States of Colombia (now Republic of Colombia).

New Guinea (gin'i), or Papua (pap'ō-ą or pi'-pō-ą). The largest island in the world, belonging to Melanesia, and situated north of Australia (from which it is separated by Torres Strait), it is bounded on the east and south by the Pacific, and on the southwest by Arafura Sea. The interior has been little explored. There are peninsulas in the northwest and southeast. The mountains (Arfak Hills, Finisterre, Kratke, etc.) reach in the Charles Louis the height of about 20,000 feet. The largest river is the Fly. The island is divided between the Dutch in the west (as far east as long. 141°), the Germans in the northeast, and the British in the south. It was first visited by the Portuguese Menezes about 1526, and was chiefly surveyed by the Dutch. The Dutch claims were made in 1848–1884 and 1886 the English and German possessions were defined. British New Guinea, under a governor (the cost of administration being borne by the three chief Australian colonies), has an area of about 90,000 square miles, and a population of about 350,000. Kaiser Wilhelm's Land, governed by the German New Guinea Company, has an area of 72,000 square miles and a population of about 200,000. Dutch New Guinea, attached to the residency of Ternate in the Moluccas, with an area of 150,755 square miles, has a population of about 300,000. Total area, about 315,000 square miles. Total population, about 660,000.

New Hampshire (hamp'shir). One of the New England States of the United States of America, extending from lat. 42° 40′ to 45° 18′ N., and from long. 70° 37′ to 72° 37′ W. Capital, Concord; largest city, Manchester. It is bounded by the province of Quebec, Canada, on the north; Maine and the Atlantic on the east, Massachusetts on the south, and Vermont (separated by the Connecticut) and Quebec on the west. Its surface is mountainous in the north and west, and elsewhere hilly. It contains the White Mountains in the north. It is often called "the Granite State" and "the Switzerland of America." It is a manufacturing State, ranking among the leading States in its chief manufactures — cotton, woolen, and worsted. It has 10 counties, sends 2 senators and 2 representatives to Congress, and has 4 electoral votes. It was visited by Pring in 1603, and by Captain John Smith in 1614; formed part of the territory granted to Mason and Gorges in 1622; was settled by the English at Portsmouth and Dover in 1623; was united to Massachusetts in 1641; was separated and made a royal province in 1679; was at times again united, and finally separated in 1741; was often disturbed by Indian wars; and claimed Vermont until 1764. It was one of the 13 original States, being the ninth to ratify the Constitution (1788). Area, 9,336 square miles. Population (1890), 376,530.

New Jersey (jėr'zi). [Named (1664) after the Isle of Jersey, in honor of Sir George Carteret, lieutenant-governor of that isle (1643–51). He had previously (1650) received a grant of "a certain island and adjacent islets in America in perpetual inheritance, to be called New Jersey" (Dict. Nat. Biog., IX. 209.)] One of the North Atlantic States of the United States of America, extending from lat. 38° 56′ to 41° 21′ N., and from long. 74° 54′ to 75° 33′ W. Capital, Trenton; largest cities, Newark and Jersey City. It is bounded by New York on the north, New York (separated by the Hudson, New York Bay, and Staten Island Sound) and the Atlantic Ocean on the east, Delaware Bay on the south and Pennsylvania and Delaware (both separated by the Delaware River) on the west. It is traversed by the Kittatinny and Highland ranges of the Appalachian system in the northern half of the southern half is a plain. It is the first State in the production of zinc, one of the leading iron-producing States, and one of the chief manufacturing States, ranking third in the manufacture of silk and silk, and among the first in the manufacture of leather, iron, hats, rubber, sugar, and steel. It has 21 counties, sends 2 senators and 10 representatives to Congress, and has 10 electoral votes. It was settled by the Dutch at Bergen probably about 1617; granted by the Duke of York to Carteret and Berkeley in 1664; recaptured by the Dutch in 1673; and restored to England in 1674. West Jersey was purchased by Quakers in 1674, East Jersey in 1682. Proprietary government ceased in 1702, New Jersey being made a royal province. It was under the same governor with New York until 1738. It was one of the thirteen original States, and was the scene of the battles of Trenton, Princeton, Monmouth, and other events in the Revolutionary War. Area, 7,576 square miles. Population (1880), 1,444,933.

New Jersey, College of, called popularly Princeton College, and sometimes Nassau Hall. An institution of learning at Princeton, New Jersey. It was chartered in 1746 and 1748, opened at Elizabethtown in 1747, and removed to Newark in 1747 and to Princeton 1755. The buildings were occupied by British and American troops in the Revolutionary War. It contains an academic department and a school of science. Connected with it is a theological seminary (under Presbyterian control). The college is attended by about 1,000 students, and the library contains over 90,000 volumes.

New Laws, Sp. Nuevas Ordenanzas (nō-a'-vās ōr-dā-nän'thäs). A code of Spanish laws promulgated in Madrid in 1543, and having for their special object the protection of American Indians. They were the outcome of the efforts of Las Casas, and were originally written by him, but were published with many changes. These laws provided that all Indian slaves should be freed unless a legal title to them could be produced by their masters. "Repartimientos," or grants of Indian labor, were greatly restricted and could not be inherited: civil and ecclesiastical offices were forbidden to hold them. The treatment of slaves was regulated, inspectors were appointed to watch over them, and provision was made for their religious instruction. At the same time some of the old audiences were suppressed and others were created. The new laws were vehemently opposed by the colonists, who declared that they would be impoverished. The viceroy of Mexico was forced to suspend them, but later (1551) they were enforced by Velasco, and 150,000 male slaves alone were freed. In Peru an attempt to enforce the laws resulted in the rebellion of Gonzalo Pizarro (see Pizarro). They were suspended as to that country in 1547, and by 1560 had become practically non-effective.

New South Wales (walz). [Named by Cook in 1770 from a fancied resemblance to the northern shores of the Bristol Channel.] A British colony in Australia. Capital, Sydney. It is bounded by Queensland on the north, the Pacific Ocean on the east, Victoria on the south, and South Australia on the west. It is traversed from north to south near the coast by a range of mountains, beyond which are vast plains in the interior. The great river system is that of the Murray. The chief industry is stock-raising, and especially sheep-raising. There are mines of gold, silver, coal, copper, and tin. The exports include wool, tallow, leather, tin, copper, and silver. The executive is vested in a governor, appointed by the crown, with a cabinet of 10 ministers. The legislative power is vested in a legislative council appointed by the crown for life and a legislative assembly elected. A penal settlement was established at Botany Bay in 1788. The development of the wool industry commenced under Governor Macquarie about 1810–20. Gold, though known in 1823, was not worked till 1851. The transportation of convicts ceased in 1855. Area, estimated, 310,700 square miles. Population (1891), 1,132,234.

New Spain (spān), Sp. Nueva España (nō-ā'vā es-pāin'yā). The colonial name of the country now called Mexico. It was first applied by Grijalva (1518) to Yucatan and Tabasco, and was extended by Cortes to all his conquests. Under the viceroys the name was also used for a much larger territory (see New Spain, Viceroyalty of), but New Spain proper, or the kingdom of New Spain, corresponded to the district under the jurisdiction of the audience of Mexico, the present southern Mexico, embracing (nearly) the modern states of Yucatan, Campeche, Tabasco, Vera Cruz, Hidalgo, Guanajuato, Michoacan, Colima, Mexico, Morelos, Tlascala, Puebla, Guerrero, Oajaca, and Chiapas.

New Spain, Viceroyalty of. The region governed by the viceroys of Mexico. The first viceroy, Mendoza, took possession in 1535. Under him, and for some time after, the viceroyalty, in its broadest sense, embraced all the Spanish possessions in Central and North America, from the southern boundary of Costa Rica, besides the West Indies and the Philippine and East Indies—that is, the five audiences of Mexico, Guadalajara, Guatemala, Santo Domingo, and Manila, and the captaincy-general of Florida. But, except in the first two, the viceroy's powers were very limited, and were soon practically restricted to military defense and a few other matters of general importance. During the 18th century the East Indies and Guatemala or Central America were completely separated. The region generally called New Spain, in which the viceroy had complete authority, consisted for a long time of the three kingdoms of New Spain, New Galicia, and New Leon, corresponding to modern Mexico and the undefined territories of New Mexico, Texas, and California, now included in the United States. In 1776 the northern provinces were separated (see Provincias Internas), and thereafter the viceroyalty corresponded nearly to the Mexico of to-day, excluding southern Chiapas, Durango, Sinaloa, Chihuahua, and Sonora, but including Upper and Lower California. The name Mexico finally supplanted that of New Spain in 1824.

Newstead Abbey (nū'sted ab'i). A building in Nottinghamshire, England, 9 miles north of Nottingham: anciently an abbey. It was founded by Henry II. as an atonement for Becket's murder in 1170, and was the home of the family of Lord Byron, obtained by Sir John Byron, his ancestor, at the dissolution of the monasteries in 1540. Numerous relics of Lord Byron are preserved in the house. He undertook to keep it up in 1818, with what remained of his fortune, but was obliged to sell it in 1815.

In 1860 he was appointed British consul at Rome, and from 1861 to 1885 was keeper of Greek and Roman antiquities at the British Museum. In 1880 he was appointed professor of archæology at University College, London. He wrote "A History of Discoveries at Halicarnassus, Cnidus, and Branchidæ" (1862), "Travels and Discoveries in the Levant" (1865), essays on art and archæology (1880), etc., and translated Panofka's "Manners and Customs of the Greeks" from the German in 1849.

Newton, Sir Isaac. Born at Woolsthorpe, near Grantham, Lincolnshire, Dec. 25, 1642 (O. S.); died at Kensington, March 20, 1727. A famous English mathematician and natural philosopher. His father, Isaac Newton, was a small freehold farmer. He matriculated at Cambridge (Trinity College) July 8, 1661; was elected to a scholarship April 28, 1664; and graduated in Jan., 1665. At the university he was especially attracted by the study of Descartes's geometry. The method of fluxions is supposed to have first occurred to him in 1665. He became a fellow of his college in 1667, and Lucasian professor at Cambridge in Oct., 1669. He became a fellow of the Royal Society in Jan., 1672. Newton's attention was probably drawn to the subject of gravitation as early as 1666. The story of the fall of the apple was first told by Voltaire, who had it from Mrs. Conduitt, Newton's niece. Kepler had discovered the laws of the planetary motions, and from these laws Newton proved that the attraction of the sun upon the planets varies inversely as the squares of their distances. Measuring the actual deflection of the moon's path from a tangent, he found it to be identical with the deflection which would be created by the attraction of the earth, diminishing in the ratio of the inverse square of the distance. This established that the same force acted in each case was thus confirmed. The success of Newton's work really depended on the determination of the length of a degree of latitude by Picard's survey in 1671. The universal law of gravitation was completely elaborated by 1685. The first book of the "Principia" or "Philosophiæ Naturalis Principia Mathematica" was presented to the Royal Society, April 28, 1686, and the entire work was published in 1687. From Jan., 1687, to Feb., 1690, he sat in Parliament for the University of Cambridge, and at this time he made the acquaintance of Locke. When his friend Charles Montagu (afterward earl of Halifax) was appointed chancellor of the exchequer, Newton was made warden of the mint in 1696 master of the mint. The reformation of English coinage was largely his work. The method of fluxions, which he had discovered, was employed in the calculations for the "Principia," but did not appear until 1693, when it was published by Wallis. It also appeared in 1704 in the first edition of the "Optics." On Feb. 24, 1689, he was elected foreign associate of the French Academy of Sciences. In 1703 he was elected president of the Royal Society, and held the office till his death.

Newton, John. Born at London, July 24, 1725; died there, Dec. 31, 1807. An English clergyman and religious poet. His father was governor of York Factory, Hudson Bay. Newton went in his father's ship in 1742, and was afterward in the navy and in the slave-trade until 1755, when he was made tide-surveyor at Liverpool, which office he held until ordained deacon in 1764, was ordained priest June, 1764, and became curate of Olney, where cowper settled, about 1767. They published the "Olney Hymns" together in 1779. In this year he was made rector of the parish of Woolnoth, London. Newton's well-known hymns, he wrote "Cardiphonia" (1781), etc., and an "Authentic Narrative" of his early life.

Newton, John. Born at Norfolk, Va., Aug. 24, 1823. An American engineer and general. He graduated at West Point in 1842; served throughout the Civil War, attaining the rank of major-general of volunteers in 1863; was made brigadier-general and chief of engineers in the regular army in 1884; was placed on the retired list in 1886; and was appointed commissioner of public works at New York in 1887, a position which he relinquished soon to accept the presidency of the Richmond and Danville Railroad Company. His chief engineering feat was the improvement of Hell Gate channel by the blasting of Hallet's Reef, etc., in 1876–84. He published "From Mail Boy to General" (1894).

Newton, R. The pseudonym under which Edward Cave began printing "The Gentleman's Magazine" in 1731.

Newton, Thomas. Born at Batley, Cheshire; died at Little Ilford, Essex, May, 1607. An English divine, schoolmaster, and poet. He translated seneca's "Thebais," and published collected English translations of Seneca's tragedies. In 1575 he published a history and chronicle of the Saracens and Turks, etc. He was regarded as one of the best writers of blank verse.

Newton, Thomas. Born at Lichfield, England, Jan. 1, 1704; died at London, Feb. 14, 1782. An English bishop and author. He wrote "Dissertations on the Prophecies" (1754–58) and annotations on Milton's "Paradise Lost" and "Paradise Regained."

Newton-Abbot (-ab'ot). A small town in Devonshire, England, situated on the Teign 14 miles south by west of Exeter. William of Orange was here proclaimed king of England in 1688.

Newton-in-Makerfield (-mak'ėr-fēld), or Newton-le-Willows (-le-wil'ōz). A town in Lancashire, England, 15 miles east of Liverpool. Population (1891), 12,861.

Newton- (or Newtown-) Stewart (-stū'art). A town in Wigtonshire, Scotland, on the Cree 7 miles north of Wigton. Population (1891), 2,738.

Newton (nū'ton). A town in Montgomeryshire, Wales, situated on the Severn 8 miles southwest of Montgomery. It is the center of the Welsh flannel manufacture. Population (1891), 6,616.

Newtown. The name given, during its earliest history, to what is now Cambridge, Massachusetts.

Newtown. A suburb of Sydney, New South Wales.

Newtownards (nū-tn-ārdz'). A town in County Down, Ireland, situated near Strangford Lough 9¼ miles east of Belfast. Population (1891), 9,197.

Newtown-Barry (nū'toun-bar'i). A village in County Wexford, Ireland, where, June 1, 1798, a force of about 350 repulsed an attack made by upward of 10,000 rebels.

Newtown-Butler (-but'ler). A place in County Fermanagh, Ireland, 73 miles northwest of Dublin. Here, in 1689, the Irish Protestants defeated the Irish Catholics.

New Ulster (ul'ster). A name formerly given to what is now the North Island of New Zealand.

New Way to Pay Old Debts, A. A play by Philip Massinger, printed in 1632, but acted before that date, and since repeatedly revived up to the present time.

I have no doubt in calling his [Massinger's] real masterpiece by the true tragic-comedy of "A New Way to Pay Old Debts." The revengeful trick by which a satellite of the great extortioner, Sir Giles Overreach, brings about his employer's discomfiture, and ruin of his own ruin, is very like the denouement of the Brass and Quilp part of the "Old Curiosity Shop," may have suggested it (for "A New Way to Pay Old Debts" is founded as an acting play well into Dickens's time), and, like it, is a little improbable. But the play is an admirable one, and Overreach (who, as well known, was supposed to be a kind of study of his half-namesake, Montgomery, the notorious impostor) is by far the best single character that Massinger ever drew.
Saintsbury, Hist. of Elizabethan Lit., p. 399.

New Westminster (west'min-stėr). A town in British Columbia, situated on Fraser River in lat. 49° 13′ N., long. 122° 54′ W., and was formerly the capital. Population, about 3,000.

New Wonder, A: A Woman Never Vext. A comedy by Chapman, printed in 1632.

New World, The. North and South America: the western hemisphere.

New York (yōrk). One of the Middle States of the United States of America, extending from lat. 40° 30′ to 45° N., and from long. 73° 51′ to 79° 46′ W. Capital, Albany; chief city, New York. It is bounded by the province of Ontario, Canada (mostly separated by Lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence) on the north, Vermont (partly separated by Lake Champlain), Massachusetts, and Connecticut on the east, Long Island Sound, New York Bay, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania (partly separated by the Delaware) on the south, and Pennsylvania and Ontario (separated by Lake Erie and the Niagara River) on the west. Long Island and Staten Island are included in it. The surface is greatly diversified. The Adirondack Mountains are in the northeast, and the Catskill Mountains, Shawangunk Mountains, Highlands, and Taconic Mountains in the east. The State belongs chiefly to the Hudson and St. Lawrence river-systems, but in part also to those of the Mississippi, Susquehanna, and Delaware. It contains many lakes, including Lakes George, Oneida, Cayuga, Seneca, Chautauqua, Owasco, Otsego, and Canandaigua, and is noted for picturesque scenery. It is called "the Empire State." It is the first State in the Union in commerce, manufactures, population, and estimated value of property; and the second State in value of farms. The agricultural products include buckwheat, barley, oats, rye, Indian corn, wheat, hay, potatoes, milk, butter, and cheese. The chief mineral products are salt, iron, and building-stone. It has 60 counties, sends 2 senators and 34 representatives to Congress, and has 36 electoral votes. The principal early Indian inhabitants were Iroquois (Five Nations). The first of New York was entered by Verrazano in 1524. Explorations were made in the north by Champlain in 1609, and in the south by Hudson in 1609. The first settlements were made by the Dutch on Manhattan Island in 1614 (or 1613). The region (called New Netherlands) was ruled by the Dutch governors Minuit, Wouter van Twiller, and Stuyvesant, and was captured by an Indian war about 1641; and conquered by the English under Nicolls in 1664. New York, New Jersey, and New England were consolidated under Andros in 1688–89. New York was the scene of many events in the French and Indian war. It was one of the thirteen original States, and was the scene of Burgoyne's surrender (1777) and other events in the Revolutionary War and War of 1812. The western part of the State was rapidly developed in the beginning of the 19th century. A new constitution was adopted in 1846. Area, 47,620 square miles. Population (1890), 5,997,853.

New York. [Named after York in England, with reference to the Duke of York, afterward James II.] A seaport and city in the State of New York, coextensive with the county of New York, situated chiefly on Manhattan Island, bordering on New York Bay and the Hudson (or North) and East rivers, in lat. 40° 43′ N., long. 74° 0′ W. Besides Manhattan Island, it comprises the annexed district north of the Harlem River, and islands in the East River and New York Bay (including Randall's, Ward's, Blackwell's, Governor's, Bedloe's, and Ellis islands). It is the largest city of the western hemisphere; after London and Paris, the largest in the world; and, after London, the chief commercial city in the world. It is the chief place of arrival for immigrants, and has more than half of the foreign trade of the country. It is the terminus of numerous steamship lines to all parts of the world, and also of many coasting lines and of railroads. Its varied manufactures include clothing, boots and shoes, bread, furniture, cigars, beer, machinery, books, etc. It is connected by ferries with Jersey City and Hoboken on the west, and by ferries and bridges with Brooklyn and Long Island on the east, and is traversed by four lines of elevated railroads. Central Park is the chief park; Broadway the main business artery; Fifth Avenue the principal fashionable street; and Wall street the financial center. The city is the seat of Columbia College, the University of the City of New York, Union Theological Seminary, and the Protestant Episcopal Seminary, and of the Astor, Mercantile, and Lenox libraries, Metropolitan Art Museum, Cooper Institute, and Museum of Natural History. The old city hall, founded in 1803, while of no definite size, is not surpassed by any other example of architecture in the city. The style is the English Renaissance, and the plan presents a central pavilion flanked by wings which at the extremities project toward the front. The building has 2 stories above the basement, the central pavilion having in addition an attic and a projecting porch of 8 Ionic columns above a broad flight of steps. The pavilion and the ends of the projecting portions of the wings are ornamented with orders of pilasters, Ionic below and Corinthian above, and with engaged columns between the windows. There is a domed, arcaded and domed central tower, surmounted by a figure of Liberty. The governor's room is adorned with an interesting collection of historical portraits. Other prominent buildings are the produce exchange, cotton exchange, custom-house, Roman Catholic cathedral, Trinity Church, and Madison Square Garden (which see). The city was settled by the Dutch in 1614 (or 1613), and called at first New Amsterdam — Manhattan Island being purchased from Indians for $24. It was surrendered to the English in 1664, retaken in 1673, and restored in 1674; was the scene of Leisler's unsuccessful insurrection in 1689–91, and of the supposed negro plot in 1741; was occupied by the British in Sept. 1776; and was held by them New York, N. Y. 736 New York, University of the City of. till 1783; was the capital from 1784 to 1797, and the capital of the United States from 1785 to 1790. Agreat fire occurred in 1835; the Astor Place riots in 1849; the Crystal Palace Industrial Exhibition in 1853; the draft riots in July, 1863; and the Orange riot July 12, 1871. (See New York, Greater, below.) Population (1890), 1,515,301, according to the national census, to which the municipal census, 1,710,745, is added in New York, Greater.

New York, Greater. A projected municipality, to include New York, Brooklyn, Staten Island, and several towns in Westchester county. A bill was passed by the legislature in 1894 to submit it to the voters of these places the question of consolidation.

New York, University of the City of. An institution of learning in New York city, founded in 1831. It contains faculties of art, science, law, and medicine, and has (1893) 99 instructors and 1,035 students.

New York Bay. The bay at the mouth of the Hudson on which New York city is situated. It includes New York Upper Bay, the harbor formed by the union of the Hudson and East rivers, partly inclosed by New York city, New Jersey, Staten Island, and Long Island (length about 6 miles), and New York Lower Bay, an arm of the Atlantic east of Staten Island and southwest of Long Island, communicating with the Upper Bay by the Narrows.

New Zealand (zē'land). A group of islands, a British colonial possession, in the Pacific Ocean, situated southeast of Australia, and included mostly between lat. 33° 55′ and 47° 8′ S., and long. 166° 20′ and 178° 30′ E. Capital, Wellington. It includes North Island, South Island, and Stewart Island. The North Island is somewhat mountainous. the South Island largely so (the southern Alps culminate in Mount Cook, 12,349 feet), the chief industry is agriculture. The leading exports are gold, wool, sheep, agricultural products, etc. Government is vested in a governor, appointed by the crown, and a legislature consisting of a house of legislative council (appointed by the crown as life members) and a house of representatives (elected). The group was discovered by Tasman in 1642, and was visited by Cook. A missionary settlement was made in 1814. The settlers have been often at war with the natives (Maoris), especially in 1860–64. Area, 104,471 square miles. Population (1891), 626,651, including 41,993 Maoris.

Ney (nā), Michel, Duc d'Elchingen, Prince de la Moskowa. Born at Saarlouis (now in Prussia), Jan. 10, 1769; shot at Paris, Dec. 7, 1815. A celebrated French marshal. He entered the army in 1787; became a general of brigade in 1796; obtained command on the Rhine in 1799; gained the victory of Elchingen Oct. 14, 1805 (for which he was created duke of Elchingen); took part in the battles of Jena Oct. 14, 1806, Eylau Feb. 7–8, 1807, and Friedland June 14, 1807; served in Spain 1808–11; rendered important service at Borodino Sept. 7, 1812 (for which he was created prince of Moskowa); commanded the rearguard in the retreat from Russia in 1812; served at Lutzen May 2, Bautzen May 20, and Leipsic Oct. 16–19, 1813; was defeated by Von Bulow at Dennewitz Sept. 6, 1813; served in the campaign of 1814; was made a peer after the restoration in 1814 by Louis XVIII.; deserted to Napoleon in 1815; was defeated by Wellington at Quatre-Bras June 16, 1815; and commanded the Old Guard at Waterloo June 18. He was condemned by the House of Peers as a traitor, and shot.

Ney, Napoléon Joseph, Prince de la Moskowa. Born May 8, 1803; died July, 1857. The son of Michel Ney: a French politician and patron of the arts.

Nez d'un Notaire (nā dun nō-tār'), Le. [F., 'The Nose of a Notary.'] A romance by Edmond About, published in 1862.

Nezhin, or Neshin, or Nejin (na-zhēn'), or Niershin, or Niezhin (nya-zhēn'). A town in the government of Tchernigoff, Russia, situated on the Oster 41 miles southeast of Tchernigoff. It was formerly of commercial importance. Population (1890), 44,794.

Nez Percé. See Chopunnish.

Ngala (ngä'lä), or Bangala (bäng-gä'lä). A Bantu tribe of the Kongo State, settled on the Kongo River where it bends to the southwest, between the Balolo, Baloi, and Babangi. Strong and brave, though notorious as cannibals, they furnish good soldiers for the Kongo State army. See Mbangala.

Ngalanganja (ngä-läng-gän'jä). See Garenganze and Nyangwe.

Ngambue (ngäm'bwe), or Bangambue (bängäm'bwe). A Bantu tribe of Angola, West Africa, settled on the Kakulovare River in the highland back of Mossamedes. They are kinsmen of the Nyaneka tribe, and, like these, peaceful agriculturists owning cattle.

Ngami (ngä'mē), Lake. A lake in southern Africa, situated about lat. 20° 30′ S., long. 22° 50′ E. It was discovered by Livingstone in 1849, and falls within the sphere of British South Africa. Its connection with the Zambesi is doubtful.

Ngange (ngäng'gä), or Manganga (mäng-gäng'gä). A Bantu tribe in British Nyassaland, at the south end of Lake Nyassa. The mountaineers are called Kantundu, the dwellers of the plain Chipeta; their dialects are slightly different. The Nyanga language has raising literature, most of which is printed in the Scotch mission stations. It is also spoken by the Makololo, who, left on the shore by Livingstone, have become powerful by accessions from neighboring tribes. See also Wanyoma.

Ngangela (ngäng-gä'lä), or Ovangangela (o-väng-gäng-gä'lä). A Bantu tribe of Angola, West Africa, east of the Upper Kunene and Kuanza rivers. They are clever iron-workers and wax-hunters, belonging to the same cluster as the Ovimbundu. See Bihé.

Nganhwei. See Anhwei.

Ngindo (ngēn'dō), or Wangindo (wäng-gēn'dō). A Bantu tribe of German East Africa, spread over a vast area between the Ruñji and Umbekuru rivers, and between their kinsmen the Wakichi and the Machonde. Their chest and arms are tattooed, and their weapons are sharpened. They have always opposed the slave-trade. The language is called Kingindo, the country Ungindo.

Ngola (ngo'lä). A Bantu tribe of Angola, West Africa, whose adapted name (Angola) is also applied to the native Angola nation and to the Portuguese province of Angola. The king of Ngola, whose residence used to be at Loanda, was driven by the Portuguese first to Pungo Andongo, and then to the Kamba and Hamba valleys, where his people still dwell in complete independence. The Ngola people are slender, dark-colored, oval-faced, with fine features and extremities, shrewd and warlike, agricultural and pastoral. Their hair is plaited and shaped into various patterns. Their dialect in its purity is the base of Kimbundu. Ndongo, Matamba, and Ndanji are the three provinces of the Ngola kingdom. Ndongo is the name generally used by the Portuguese for Ngola or Ndongo.

Ngornu. See Angoron.

Nguru (ngö'rö). A mountainous and fertile district west of Zanzibar, drained by the Luseru and Luiga rivers. The population is dense, and consists of the Wanguru, Wakhutu, and Wakhalamba tribes, whose villages are fortified by stockades. See also Kinaru.

Niagara (nī-ag'a-rä). A river in North America which flows from Lake Erie northward into Lake Ontario. It separates New York on the east from the province of Ontario, Canada, on the west. Length, 36 miles. It falls, about 220 feet in rapids and cataract. See Niagara Falls.

Niagara. A town in Niagara County, New York, situated on the river Niagara, and containing the villages of Niagara Falls and Suspension Bridge. Population (1890), 10,979.

Niagara, Battle of. See Lundy's Lane.

Niagara Falls. The largest cataract in the world, situated in the Niagara River 17 miles north-northwest of Buffalo. It is divided by Goat Island into the American Fall (164 feet high) and the Canadian or Horseshoe Fall (158 feet high). The width of the river at the brink of the fall is 4,750 feet. The water-power of the falls (the total amount of which is believed to be several millions of horse-power — much more than all the steam and water-power now utilized in the United States) is now, in small part, utilized by means of turbine water-wheels set at the bottom of shafts 140 feet deep and connected with a tunnel at the escape of the water, which empties below the town of Niagara.

Niagara Falls, from the Canadian side. A painting by F. E. Church (1857), in the Corcoran gallery, Washington. The same artist's painting of Niagara from the American side is in the Stewart collection, New York.

Niagara Falls. A village in Niagara County, New York, situated opposite Niagara Falls. Population (1890), 5,502.

Niagara or Brazil. The cataract of Paulo Affonso on the river São Francisco.

Niagusta (nē-a-gös'tä), or Nausa (nou'sä). A town in Macedonia, European Turkey, 52 miles west of Saloniki. It is noted for its wine. Population, estimated, 5,000.

Niam-Niam. See Nam Nam.

Niantic. See Narragansett.

Nias (nē-äs'). An island west of Sumatra, situated in lat. 1° N., long. 98° 15′ E.

Niassa. See Nyassa.

Nibelungenlied (nē'be-löng-en-lēd). [G., 'Song of the Nibelungs.'] A Middle High German epic poem, written in its present form by an unknown author in South Germany in the first half of the 13th century. The legends, however, are much earlier, having been handed down orally. Its hero, Siegfried, is a mythical prince and later king of Niderland (the region about Xanten on the lower Rhine), who possessed the so-called "hoard of the Nibelungs," won by him in Norway. He wooed Brunhild, a princess of Island, for the Burgundian king Gunther, whose sister, Kriemhild, became his wife. He was afterward treacherously slain, and the hoard was ultimately sunk in the Rhine. The Nibelungenlied is the greatest monument of early German literature. Historical and mythical elements are mingled in it. Wagner's "Ring of the Nibelungs" has taken little except names from the German epic. The source of the material is the Old Norse version of the legend contained in the Volsunga saga and the Edda. See Lassberg Nibelungen.

Nibelungs (nē'be-löngz). The. See Nibelungenlied.

Niblo's Garden. A theater on Broadway, near Prince street, New York city. It is one of the oldest in the city having been erected in 1828 as the Sans Souci; in 1829 it was a concert saloon. Niblo's garden and theater, owned by William Niblo, were opened in 1849, burned in 1846 and in 1872, and reopened the latter year. It has long been used for spectacular and romantic drama.

Nicæa (nī-sē'a). Anglicized as Nice (nēs). [Gr. Νίκαια.] In ancient geography, a town in Bithynia, Asia Minor, situated on Lake Ascanius 58 miles southeast of Constantinople; the modern Isnik. It was built in the 4th century B.C., and was one of the chief cities of Bithynia; was the seat of the first general church council in 325 A. D., and of the seventh in 787; and was taken by the Crusaders in 1097, and by the Turks in 1326.

Nicæa (in France). [Gr. Νίκαια.] See Nice.

Nicæa, Empire of. A Greek empire (1206–61), founded by Theodore Lascaris, which had its center at Nicæa, Asia Minor, during the period of the Latin Empire at Constantinople. It was merged in the restored Byzantine empire in 1261.

Nicander (nī-kan'dėr). [Gr. Νικάνδρος.] Lived probably in the 2d century B. C. A Greek poet, grammarian, and physician, author of two extant poems on venomous animals and poisons.

Nicander (nē-kän'der), Karl August. Born at Strengnäs, Sweden, March 20, 1799; died Feb. 7, 1839. A Swedish poet. The death of his father while he was a child in Finland with the Swedish early life he was a tutor. His first important work was the dramatic poem "Runesvardet" (1821), whose motive is the conflict between heathendom and Christianity. Two poems, "Tassos dod" ("The Death of Tasso") and "Konung Enzio" ("King Enzio"), the former of which won the prize of the Swedish Academy, are on lyric subjects. He was now (1827) enabled to undertake a journey to Rome, which, however, ended disastrously in that he was left, without means, to make his way home as best he could. Subsequently he was given a subordinate position in the public service, and made some translations for the royal theater. "Minnen fran Sodern" ("Reminiscences of the South"), a description of his travels, appeared in 1834. This was followed by "Hesperiden" ("The Hesperides"), a volume of poems and tales. His last work was the poem "Lejonet i Okmen" ("The Lion in the Wilderness"), a parable of Sweden's life to within a few years of his death, when his literary work at last yielded him an income sufficient for his needs, was almost a constant struggle with want. His collected works appeared at Stockholm in 20 vols., 1847–49.

Nicaragua (nik-a-ra'gwa or nē-ka-rä'gwä). One of the five republics of Central America. Capital, Managua; chief city, Leon. It is bounded by Honduras on the northwest and north, the Caribbean Sea on the east, Costa Rica on the south, the Pacific on the west, and is traversed from southeast to northwest by a depression including the river San Juan and Lakes Nicaragua and Managua (the route of the proposed ship-canal). Much of the eastern coast included in the Mosquito Reservation is low (see Mosquitia). There are numerous volcanoes; earthquakes are frequent and sometimes violent. The most important exports are coffee, hides, cabinet-woods, rubber, fruits, and gold; silver mining, formerly a very important industry, has been abandoned. The inhabitants are Spanish creoles, Indians, a few negroes, and mixed races. Spanish is the common language, and the state religion is Roman Catholic. The chief executive is a president, chosen for 4 years; and congress consists of a senate and chamber of deputies. Columbus coasted the eastern side of Nicaragua in 1502, but it was first explored from the Pacific side by Gil Gonzalez Davila in 1521–22. It was settled 1524–25 by Francisco Hernandez de Cordoba, acting for Pedrarias. During the colonial period it was a province of Guatemala. Independence was proclaimed in 1821, and from 1824 to 1839 Nicaragua was a state in the Central American Federation. Since 1840 it has been an independent republic. Civil wars and struggles with the other Central American republics have been frequent. The filibuster Walker held a part of the country 1855–56. Area, about 49,000 square miles. Population (estimated, 1894), 360,000.

Nicaragua, Lake. [See Nearuo.] A lake in the southern part of Nicaragua. It receives the waters of Lake Managua by the Tipitapa, and has its outlet in the San Juan. The surface is 110 feet above sea-level, the depth varying from 12 to 50 feet. There are several islands, the largest, Ometepe, containing two volcanic peaks. Length, 92 miles; greatest width, 34 miles.

Nicaragua Canal. A proposed ship-canal between the Pacific Ocean and the Caribbean Sea, crossing the republic of Nicaragua and utilizing the natural waterway furnished by Lake Nicaragua and the San Juan River. Partial surveys of this route were made by Americans in 1826 and 1837–1838, and more complete ones for the United states government in 1872–73 by commander E. P. Lull, and in 1885 by A. G. Menocal. The Nicaraguan government made concessions for constructing the canal to Americans in 1849 and 1851 and to a French company in 1858, but they all lapsed without results. In 1884 a treaty was signed for the construction of the canal by the United States government, but the Senate refused to ratify it. In 1887 the Nicaraguan government granted a new concession for 100 years (confirmed by Costa Rica) to the Nicaraguan Canal Company, by which it was transferred to the Maritime Canal Company. The latter was organized May 1, 1889, under a charter from the United States government, and it agreed to complete the work within five years. The route decided upon is from San Juan del Norte on the Caribbean Sea to Brito on the Pacific coast, a distance of 169 miles. Of this about 117 miles is through the lake and the San Juan River, and in the summer advantage can be taken of 22 miles more, and that the actual excavations will not exceed 27 miles. There are to be two canals proper, each with three locks: one from Ochoa on the San Juan River to the port of San Juan del Norte (about 25 miles), including the Indiana Harbor, and the other from Lake Nicaragua, at the mouth of the river Lajas, to Brito (47 miles). The locks are to bring the canals to the necessary summit level, which in the lake is 110 feet. The deepest excavation will be on the eastern section where it crosses the eastern divide; here, for 3 miles, the average depth to be excavated is 81 feet. Subsidiary works are Indiana Ochoa, improvement of the river and lake channels, improvement of the harbor of San Juan del Norte, and the construction of a harbor at Brito, with the building of a short railroad for the transportation of machinery. The work was undertaken by the Nicaragua Construction Company, organized under the laws of Colorado June 10, 1887. This company purchased a part of the plant which had been built on the Panama Canal, and actual work was commenced at San Juan June 3, 1889. A great part of the necessary railroad was built and improvements of the harbor of San Juan (said to have been unsuccessful) were made. Work practically ceased from lack of funds in Dec., 1892, and on Aug. 30, 1893, the Nicaragua Construction Company went into the hands of a receiver. Measures for forming a new construction company commenced soon after. American engineers have generally favored the Nicaragua route as compared with other proposed canal routes across the Isthmus. The chief objection raised to it, principally by French engineers, is the supposed liability of the canal to injury from earthquakes or volcanic eruptions.

Nicarao (nē-kä-rä'ō), or Nicaragua. A Central American Indian chief, whose tribe occupied territory near a large lake, subsequently called Lake Nicaragua (Nicarao-agua, 'water of Nicarao') by the Spaniards, from his name. The tribe was powerful and rich. Gil Gonzalez Davila first visited them in 1522, and obtained much gold by trading. See Nicaraos.

Nicaraos (nē-kä-rä'ōs), or Nicaraguas (nē-kä-rä'gwäz), or Niquirans (nē-kē-rānz'). [From the name of their chief.] A tribe of Indians which, at the time of the conquest, inhabited western Nicaragua, between Lake Nicaragua and the Pacific. The Nicaraos appear to have been a distant offshoot of the Nahuatlecan stock. They were early subdued by the Spaniards, and their descendants form part of the peaceful population of the same district.

Nicaria (nē-kä-rē'ä). An island in the Ægean Sea, belonging to the Sporades, 13 miles west of Samos: the ancient Icaria. It is a Turkish possession. Length, 25 miles.

Nice, It. Nizza (nēt'sä). A seaport and the capital of the department of Alpes-Maritimes, France, situated on the Mediterranean in lat. 43° 42′ N., long. 7° 17′ E.: the ancient Nicæa. It is one of the largest winter health-resorts of the Riviera, picturesquely situated at the foot of the Alps. It exports fruit, and has manufactures of oil and perfumes. The principal places of resort are the Promenade des Anglais and the Jardin Public. Nice was founded by Massilians in the 5th century B. C. In the middle ages it belonged to the county of Provence. It was sacked by the Saracens; passed to Savoy in 1388; was captured by Barbarossa; passed to France in 1792, and again to Sardinia in 1814; and was ceded to France in 1860. It was severely damaged by earthquake in 1887. It was the birthplace of Massena and Garibaldi. Population (1891), 83,273.

Nice (in Bithynia). See Nicæa.

Nice, Councils of. See Nicene Councils.

Nice, True of. A truce concluded at Nice, in 1538, between Francis I. of France and the emperor Charles V.

Nicene Councils. Two general councils which met at Nicæa in Asia Minor. The first Nicene Council, which was also the first general council, met in 325, condemned Arianism, and promulgated the Nicene Creed in its earlier form. The second Nicene Council, accounted also the seventh general council, was held in 787, and condemned the Iconoclasts. The recognition of the first Nicene Council as ecumenical has been almost universal among Christians of all confessions. It is acknowledged to the present day not only by the Roman Catholic and Greek churches, and by many Protestant churches, but by Nestorians, Jacobites, and Copts. The Anglican church does not accept the second Nicene Council as ecumenical.

Nicene Creed or Symbol. A summary of the chief tenets of the Christian faith, first set forth as of ecumenical authority by the first Nicene Council (325), but closely similar in wording to the Creed of Cæsarea in Palestine. It is especially founded upon the baptismal creed of the Church of Cæsarea in Palestine.

Nicholas (nik'ō-las), Saint. [Prop. spelled Nicolas; F. Nicolas (also Nicole, whence E. Nicol, Nicoll, Nichol, Nicholls, etc.), Sp. Nicolás, Pg. Nicolão, It. Nicola, Nicolo, D. Niklaas, Klaas, G. Nikolaus, Niklas, Klaus, Russ. Nikolai, Nikola, L. Nicolaus, also Nicolas, from Gr. Νικόλαος, later forms of which are Νικόλας and Νικόλεως, victor of the people.] Lived about 300 A. D. A bishop of Myra, Lycia, Asia Minor. He has been adopted as the patron saint of Russia, and is also regarded as the patron saint of seafaring men, thieves, virgins, and children. He is a prominent saint of the Greek Church, and his festival is celebrated Dec. 6. He owes his position as Santa Claus (corruption of Sant Nicolaus) to the legend that he wished to preserve the three daughters of a poor nobleman from dishonor when the father, having no money for marriage portions, was about to force them to support themselves by a degrading life. St. Nicholas, passing the house at night, threw a purse of gold in at an open window for three nights in succession, thus furnishing a dowry for each daughter. On the third night the nobleman watched for and discovered him, but the saint made him promise not to reveal his munificence. From this incident is said to be derived the custom of placing gifts in the shoes or stockings of children on the eve of St. Nicholas's day, and attributing the gifts to Santa Claus. The custom has in some countries been transferred to Christmas. The election of a boy bishop on St. Nicholas's day (Dec. 6) is an ancient ceremony. The custom prevailed in English cathedrals, grammar-schools, etc., but especially at Salisbury. The actors were the choristers, and the boy bishop was chosen from among them. He held a burlesque jurisdiction until Innocents' day (Dec. 29). The ritual was an exact burlesque of the episcopal function. The custom died out with the establishment of Protestantism, but lingered in the Eton Montem, a celebration now abolished.

He edited the periodical "Allgemeine deutsche Bibliothek," and wrote "Anekdoten von Friedrich II." (1788–92), the novel "Leben und Meinungen des Herrn Magisters Sebaldus Nothanker" (1773–76), etc.

He was the literary associate of Lessing and Moses Mendelssohn in the "Letters concerning Recent German Literature" and the "Universal German Library," published between 1759 and 1792 . . . Soon after the appearance of Goethe's "Sorrows of Werther," Nicolai published a malicious and rather stupid parody entitled "The Joys of Werther." . . . He has been called the Erz-Philister the arch-representative of the commonplace, conventional element in German literature. . . . Goethe was provoked into using the only weapon which he considered fitting—ridicule; and he was assisted by Nicolai's own indiscretion. The latter, whose literary materialism was his prominent quality,—who fought the spiritual element as Luther fought the devil, was visited in 1791 with an avenging malady. He was troubled by apparitions of persons living and dead, who filled his room, and for several weeks continued to haunt and torment him although he knew them to be phantasms. He finally relieved by the application of leeches about the end of the spine, whence Goethe's term Proktophantasmist (in "Faust"), which may be delicately translated as "Bumpkinism." . . . He died in 1811, after having seen himself pilloried in the "Walpurgis-Night."

B. Taylor, Notes to Faust.

Nicolai, Otto. Born at Königsberg, Prussia, June 9, 1810: died at Berlin, May 11, 1849. A German composer and conductor. [Skt., corrupted from nigrantha, strung together, ranked.] In Sanskrit, any glossary, but especially the Vedic glossary explained by Yaska in his Niruktı: in this sense usually plural (Nighantavas) as embracing five books. The first three contain synonyms, the fourth a list of specially difficult words, and the fifth a classification of the divine personages who figure in the Veda.

Night and Morning. Two circular reliefs in marble by Thorwaldsen, in the Thorwaldsen Museum at Copenhagen, Denmark: familiar in popular reproductions. Night and Morning are two winged, richly draped female figures sweeping through the air. The former clasps sleeping children to her breast, and is accompanied by an owl; the latter scatters flowers.

Night and Morning. A novel by Bulwer Lytton, published in 1841.

Nightingale (nīt'ing-gāl), Florence. Born at Florence, May, 1820. An English philanthropist. She inspected schools and hospitals in England and afterward in all parts of Europe, and finally decided to become a hospital nurse. She especially celebrated for her noble services at Scutari during the Crimean war, 1854–56. Her health suffered severely from the continued strain and her unselfish devotion. At the close of the war she was enabled by a testimonial fund to found an institution for the training of nurses, the Nightingale Home at St. Thomas's Hospital. She was also the means of calling attention to the unsanitary conditions of camp hospitals, etc. She published "The Institution at Kaiserswerth on the Rhine" (1850), "Notes on Hospitals" (1859), "Notes on Nursing" (1860), and "Suggestions on the Sanitary State of the Army in India" (1863), etc.

Nightmare Abbey. A novel by Thomas Love Peacock, published in 1818.

Night Thoughts. A meditative poem on religion and morality, by Edward Young (1742–44). In whole it contains nine Cantos.

The extraordinary vogue of "Night Thoughts," which lasted for a century, has succumbed to a series of vigorous attacks in our own age, and Young is now in danger of being underrated.

Gosse, Eighteenth Century Literature, p. 213.

Night Walker, The, or the Little Thief. A comedy by Fletcher and Shirley, licensed in 1633, printed in 1640 as by Fletcher only. This play has been incorrectly conjectured to be the same as "The Late Lancashire Witches," which was licensed in 1633.

Night-Watch, The, or Sortie of the Banning Cock Company. A masterpiece by Rembrandt (1642), in the Rijks Museum at Amsterdam. It represents an ensemble of the entire guard (twenty-eight), with their officers, banner, and drummer. All the figures are portraits, full of life and spirit; and the picture is admirable in light and color.

Nigra (nē'grä), Count Costantino. Born at Castellamonte, near Ivrea, Italy, June 12, 1827. An Italian diplomatist. He served in 1848 as a volunteer in the Sardinian army against the Austrians, but afterward entered the diplomatic service, and acted as secretary of legation at the Congress of Paris in 1856. He was for many years Italian ambassador at Paris, and held the same position at St. Petersburg 1876–82, and at London 1882–85.

Nihilists (nī'hil-ists). The adherents of nihilism. Nihilism was originally a social (not a political) movement in Russia in opposition to the customary forms of matrimony, the parental authority, and the tyranny of custom; later, a more or less organized secret effort on the part of a party of reconstruction to overturn the established order of things, both social and political. In the former sense the word was introduced by Turgeniev in 1862. Nihilism comprises several Russian parties, differing in the means of action employed and in the immediate results aimed at, some leaning more to political revolutionary violence, and others toward economic reorganization and socialism. The movement originated about 1840, and is due largely to the influence of the universities. From 1855–62 it became increasingly democratic, socialistic, and revolutionary under the leadership of Herzen and the magazine "Contemporary." About 1870 revolutionary ideas became the subject of a propaganda among the peasants and students. The adherents of this movement formed a "people's party" ("Land and Freedom") purposing the complete overthrow of the existing order of things and the establishment of a socialistic and democratic order in its stead. Under the influence of Bakunin (died 1876), and the persecution of peaceful propagandists by the government, the people's party divided into two factions—the "democratization of land" and the "will of the people," the latter being the stronger. This party was by government persecutions driven to a political contest, and the idea of demoralizing the forces of the government by terror originated and became popular: the adherents of this system called themselves "terrorists." After several unsuccessful attempts, they effected the death of the czar Alexander II. in 1881.

Nigata (nē-ē-gā'tä). A seaport in the province of Echigo, main island of Japan, situated on the western coast in lat. 37° 57′ N., long. 139° 3′ E. It is open to foreign commerce. Population (1891), 47,019.

It is surrounded by Kostroma, Vyatka, Kazan, Simbirsk, Penza, Tambof, and Vladimir. The surface is generally flat. The government has considerable commerce and manufactures. Area, 19,597 square miles. Population (1890), 1,760,000.

2. The capital of the government of Nijni-Novgorod, situated at the junction of the Oka with the Volga in lat. 56° 19′ N., long. 44° E. Its famous fair, the largest in the world, held annually in August and Sept., is frequented by from 200,000 to 300,000 merchants from Russia and Western and central Asia. The chief articles of trade are cotton, woolen, iron, corn, salt, tea, furs, silk, and manufactured goods of all kinds. The fair was transferred hither from Makarief in 1817. The town has also an annual fair for wooden wares, and one for the sale of horses. It is the center of steam navigation of the Volga. It was plundered by the Mongols in 1238; was united to Moscow in 1390; and took the lead under Minin in 1611 in freeing Moscow from the Poles. Population (1889), 74,436.

Nika (nē'kä), or Manika (mä-nē'kä). The Bantu tribe inhabiting Mashonaland.

Nike (nī'kē). [Gr. Νίκη, the personification of victory.] In Greek mythology, the goddess of victory: called by the Romans Victoria. She was regularly represented in ancient art as a winged maiden, usually as just alighting or flying. She bore frequent attributes being a palm-branch in one hand and a garland in the other, or a fillet outstretched in both hands: sometimes she holds a herald's staff.

Nike. An original statue by Pæonius, in the museum at Olympia, dedicated in the Altis by the Messenians about 420 B. C. The goddess is represented as sweeping through the air, with drapery pressed to her form and streaming behind in the wind.

Nike Apteros, or Wingless Victory, Temple of. A beautiful little Ionic amphiprostyle tetrastyle temple at Athens, measuring 18 by 27 feet, standing on a high stone platform projecting beyond the Propylæa. The columns are 13½ feet high. The frieze is sculptured in high relief with gods on the east and with Athenian martial exploits on the other sides. The platform on which it stands surrounds the parapet balustrade on which were carved Victories, among them the famous relief of "Victory loosing her sandal." The temple was pulled down by the Turks, and the materials buried under the works of a battery; they were found in 1835, almost complete, by German scholars, and restored to their original positions.

Nikisch (nē'kish), Arthur. Born at Szent-Miklós, Hungary, Oct. 12, 1855. A Hungarian composer and conductor. He came to the United States in 1889, and conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra from that time till 1893, when he went to Budapest as kapellmeister and conductor of the opera.

Nikitish (nē-kē'tish), or Nikitine (nē-kē'tin). Ivan. Born at Voronezh, 1826; died 1861. A Russian poet. He wrote lyric folk-songs. His life was passed in poverty, and he was obliged to keep an inn to support himself. He changed this for the more congenial occupation of bookseller.

Nikko (nēk'kō). A small town in the main island of Japan, 80 miles north of Tokio. It is a Shintoist and Buddhist religious center, noted for its temples. The Iyeyasu temple is one of the most splendid sanctuaries of the Shinto cult created in the 17th century. The sanctuary consists of a succession of courts with gates of wood and bronze, adorned with the most elaborate carving and with brilliant color. Upon the courts face a great number of buildings of different sizes and forms and various purposes: they are built of wood, but every beam and joint is a work of art. The ornament in metal is of the delicacy of jewelry, and that in terra-cotta of equally perfect workmanship. In the midst of this richness, vulgarity is avoided and the ornament is kept severely subordinate to constructive propriety.

Nikola (nē'kō-lä) I., or Nikita (nē-kē'tä). Born Oct. 7, 1841. Prince of Montenegro. He was proclaimed prince in 1860, and carried on war against Turkey 1876–78.

Nikopol (nē-kō'pōl). A town in the government of Yekaterinoslaff, southern Russia, situated on the Dnieper 64 miles south-southwest of Yekaterinoslaff. It is a trading center. Population, 8,144.

Nikopoli, or Nicopoli (nē-kop'ō-lē), Turk. Nighebolii (nē-ge-bō'lē) or Nebul (ne-bōl'). [See Nicopolis.] A town in Bulgaria, situated on the Danube, near the confluence of the Osma, in lat. 43° 42′ N., long. 24° 53′ E. It has been erroneously identified with the ancient Nicopolis ad Istrum. It was long noted as a fortress, and was conquered by Sigismund of Hungary, April 1396. Sultan Bajazet I. defeated here the Franco-Hungarian army under Sigismund Sept. 28, 1396. It was unsuccessfully attacked by Ladislaus of Hungary in 1444. The Turks were defeated here by Báthori Sept. 6, 1595, and by the Polish army in 1598. It was conquered by the Russians in 1810. The Turkish fleet was destroyed near it and their camp stormed by the Russians in 1829. It was taken by the Russians in 1877. Population, 4,652.

Nikosia. See Nicosia.

Niksar (nik-sär'), or Niksara (nik-sä'rä). A town in the vilayet of Trebizond, Asiatic Turkey, situated near the Kelkit-Tchai 145 miles west by south of Trebizond: the ancient Neocæsarea, and probably the ancient Cabira. Population, 9,000.

Nikshich (nik'shich). A fortified town in Montenegro, 26 miles north of Cettinje. It was besieged and taken from the Turks by the Montenegrins in 1877. Population, about 3,000.

Nile (nīl). [F. Nil, Sp. Pg. It. Nilo, G. Nil, L. Nilus, from Gr. Νεῖλος.] The longest river of Africa, and one of the longest rivers in the world: the ancient Nilus. It is formed by several head streams which flow into Lake Victoria Nyanza. Of these the Kagera, Shimiyu, and Isanga are the chief. From Victoria Nyanza the Nile flows northwest, forming the Ripon and Murchison falls, into the Albert Nyanza. Thence it flows generally north (as the Bahr-el-Jebel, later as the Bahr-el-Abiad or White Nile) to the junction with the Bhar-el-Ghazal, traverses the Nubian desert, and passes by five cataracts into the valley of Egypt; and empties by a wide delta into the Mediterranean Sea. Its principal tributaries are the Sobat and Dinsheta branches. It fertilizes the valley of Egypt by its annual overflow (caused by the melting of the snows in the elevated regions drained by its head waters), which at its height in September and October. It has been famous in ancient and modern times for the kingdoms on its banks, and for the attempts to discover its sources. Its chief tributaries are the Bahr-el-Ghazal, Blue Nile, and Atbara. It receives no tributaries below Berber. The chief places on its banks are Lado, Gondokoro, Khartum, Berber, New Dongola, Dorr, Assuan, Siut, and Cairo. The source of the upper Nile was a mystery until recent times. Bruce in 1770 found the source of the Blue Nile. In 1858 the Victoria Nyanza was discovered by Speke; in 1864 the Albert Nyanza by Baker, and in 1889 the Albert Edward Nyanza by Stanley. The upper basin falls mainly within the British sphere of influence, partly within the German, and perhaps the Italian. The middle valley is held (1894) by the dervishes. Length about 3,400 miles.

On the rocks of Semneh and Kümmeh the highest point of the inundation was always noted for comparison, and the mark was accompanied by a corresponding inscription. Thus we read at one place on the rock: "Height of the Nile in the year 14, under the reign of his Majesty King Amen-em-hat III., the ever-living." From observations made by Lepsius on the spot, we gather that in the times of the Twelfth Dynasty — that is, forty-three centuries before our days — the highest rise was nearly twenty-seven feet above the greatest height of the inundation in these days; and that the average height of the Nile when Amen-emhat III. was king surpasses that of our times by about twelve feet. Brugsch, Egypt under the Pharaohs, p. 75.

Nile, Battle of the. A name often given to the British naval victory of Aug. 1–2, 1798. See Aboukir, Bay of.

Nimar (nē-mär'). A district in the Central Provinces, British India, intersected by lat. 21° 45′ N., long. 76° 30′ E. Area, 3,340 square miles. Population (1881), 231,341.

Nimburg (nim'bōrg). A town in Bohemia, on the Elbe 27 miles east by north of Prague. Population, in commune, 6,659.

Nimeguen. See Nimwegen.

Nimes, or Nismes (nēm). The capital of the department of Gard, France, situated in lat. 43° 51′ N., long. 4° 21′ E.: the Roman Nemausus. It has important manufactures of silk goods, and an extensive trade, especially in wine and spirits. It is noted for its ancient antiquities, among which are the amphitheater (in excellent preservation), the Maison Carrée (which see), the so-called temple of Diana, the Tour Magne (Turris Magna), and gates. It contains a cathedral, lyceum, picture-gallery, fountain garden, etc. In the vicinity is the Pont du Gard. Nimes was conquered by the Romans in 121 B. C., and became one of the chief provincial cities. It was captured by the Vandals in 407, and suffered from the West Goths and Saracens; was united to France in 1259; suffered in the Huguenot wars; and was the scene of reactionary atrocities against the Protestants in 1815. It was the birthplace of Guizot. Population (1891), 71,623.

Nimrod (nim'rod). According to Gen. x., son of Cush, grandson of Ham, famous for his exploits as a hunter, at first ruler of Shinar (Shumir, i. e. South Babylonia), then founder of the Assyrian Tetrapolis (Asshur, Nineveh, Rehoboth-Ir, and Calah). Some Assyriologists identify Nimrod with Izdubar or Gilgamesh, the epic hero of the Babylonian Izdubar legends, or "Nimrod Epic." See Izdubar.

Outside the pages of the Old Testament nothing is known of Nimrod. The monuments of Assyria and Babylonia have hitherto refused to divulge the name. Certain scholars incline to suppose that he is the personification of the name of the hero of the great Chaldæan Epic, but we now know that such is not the case. Nimrod still remains to be discovered in the cuneiform texts.

Sayce, Races of the O. T., p. 66.

Nimrod. A pseudonym of C. J. Apperley, a writer on hunting, etc., in the "Quarterly Review."

Nimrud (nim'rūd). An important archæological site in Assyria, on the left bank of the Tigris about 19 miles below Nineveh: the ancient Calah (which see). It was excavated by Layard between 1845 and 1851, and yielded the remarkable series of sculptures now in the Assyrian Gallery in the British Museum. The site was occupied by several palaces in succession, according to the oriental custom which required each monarch to build his own. The confusion of the ruins and reconstructions makes the architectural history of the site difficult to unravel; however, except Khorsabad, this has been the most carefully explored and the most picturesque site in Assyria. It is particularly interesting for its abundant remains of vaults built of crude brick in courses inclined diagonally against each other, so as to obviate the use of centering.

Nimwegen (nim'wā-gen), or Nymegen, or Nimeguen (nim'ā-gen). D. also Nijmegen (ni'mā-chen), F. Nimègue (nē-mag'). A city in the province of Gelderland, Netherlands, situated on the Waal in lat. 51° 51′ N., long. 5° 52′ E.: the Roman Noviomagus. It has a fine situation, and contains the church of St. Stephen, stadhuis, and ruins of the Carolingian palace. It was the birthplace of Charles the Great and other monarchs. Later it was a free imperial city and Hanseatic town. It stood the Utrecht treaty in 1579; was taken by the Spaniards in 1585, retaken by the Dutch in 1591; and taken by the French in 1672 and in 1794. Population (1891), 32,000.

Nimwegen, Peace of. A series of treaties concluded at Nimwegen in 1678 and 1679. With these of Westminster between Holland and England (Feb. 9, 1674), of Fontainebleau between France and Denmark (Sept. 2, 1679), of Lund between Denmark and Sweden (Sept. 26, 1679), and of Celle between Brandenburg and Sweden and Brandenburg (Oct. 29, 1679), the peace and treaties between France and Holland (which were originated with the attack on Holland by France in 1672. The treaty between France and Holland was concluded Aug. 10, 1678; that between France and Spain Sept. 17, 1678; that between the emperor on the one hand and France and Sweden on the other Feb. 5, 1679, and that between Holland and Sweden Oct. 12, 1679. By them Louis received all his territory back on original frontiers, save Franche-Comté, Spanish Flanders, Valenciennes, Cambray, Gondrecourt, Aire, Bouchain, St.-Omer, Ypres (ced. 1713), Charlemont, Maubeuge, and other places in Hainaut. Burgundy, Philippeville, Binche, Oudenarde, Ath, Courtray, Limburg, Ghent, Waes, Puycerda, etc., to Spain; the emperor ceded Freiburg-im-Breisgau to France, and the Duke of Lorraine was restored to his duchy, but on conditions which he refused to accept.

Niña (nēn'yä). La. [Sp., 'little girl.'] One of the smaller caravels of Columbus in his voyage of 1492. It was an undecked vessel, probably not over 60 feet long and was commanded by Vicente Yañez Pinzon. After the wreck of the Santa Maria (Dec. 24, 1492) Columbus returned in the Niña to Europe.

Ninety-Six (nin'ti-siks'). A village in Abbeville County, South Carolina, 74 miles west by north of Columbia. It was unsuccessfully besieged by the Americans under Greene in 1781.

Ninety-Three (nin'ti-thrē'). [F. Quatre-vingt-treize.] A historical novel by Victor Hugo, published in 1874. The scene is laid in the northwest of France in 1793.

Nineveh (nin'e-vē). [Heb. Nineveh, Assyr. Ninua, or Nineveh, G. Ninive.] In ancient geography, an important city and for a long time the capital of the Assyrian empire, situated on the eastern bank of the upper Tigris opposite the modern Mosul, and surrounded in ancient times by a shallow river (Khosr). The site now marked by the two mounds of Kuyunjik and Nebi Yunus, was first identified in 1820 by C. J. Rich, political resident for the British East India Company at Baghdad. The first attempts at excavation were made in 1842 by Paul Emile Botta, who, however, met with slight success. Greater success attended the one-year-long study by Sir Austen Henry Layard (1845–47, 1849–51), by Hormuzd Rassam (1851), and by George Smith (1873–76), the work being again taken up by Rassam on the death of Smith. As a result of these excavations, the general outline of the city, the remains of four palaces and numerous sculptures, and thousands of tablets or parts of tablets of the so-called library of Assurbanipal, have been found. The greater part of these is now in the British Museum. The city had a circumference of from 7 to 8 miles, the ruins of its walls showing a thickness in some parts of 30 feet. It was in existence as early as the time of Samsi-ramman (1816 B. C.), who rebuilt a temple there. Shalmaneser I. (1300 B. C.) built a palace on Nineveh, and made the city of his residence. Samsi-ramman III. (824–811) decorated and restored the temple of Ishtar, famous for a special phase of the cult of the goddess (see Ishtar). Rammân-nirari III. (811–782) built a new palace on the site of that of Shalmaneser I., on Nebi Yunus. For a time Nineveh was neglected. Sargon (722–705 B. C.), the founder of the new dynasty, abandoning it as the capital for a new town, Dur-Sharrukin (Khorsabad), which he built and made his residence. His son Sennacherib (705–681 B. C.), however, expended picture of Nineveh. He surrounded the city with a double (40 cubit) or small palace at the northeast wall by it he erected one built another palace which he filled with color was Lord adorned with colossal bulls and lions, and beautified the city with a park. The old Testament (2 Ki. xix. 36; Isa. xxxvii. 37) mentions Nineveh as the residence of Sennacherib. Esarhaddon (681–668 B. C.) finished a temple, widened the streets, and beautified the city. Under the kings of Nineveh it was equipped to furnish materials for adorning the city and palaces. Nineveh succumbed to the combined attack of the Medes under Cyaxares and the Babylonians under Nabopolassar in 607 (606?) B. C. See also Assurs, Canaries, Kuyunjik, and New Yunus.

Nine Worthies, The. Nine heroes of romance and chivalry whose story is told in Arthurian legends. In one of these, the "Triumphes neufs Preux," "the author feigns that there appeared to him in a vision nine heroes and in a second vision eleven heroes, viz., Joshua, David, Judas Maccabæus, Hector, Alexander the Great, Julius Cæsar, and then Arthur, Charlemagne, Godfrey of Bouillon, and finally Bertrand du Guesclin; they charge him to undertake the description of their lives and feats, in order that Lady Triumphe, who appears with them, may be enabled to decide which of them has deserved her crown. . . . The nine heroes of this romance are not infrequently mentioned in the earlier English literature. Shakespeare alludes to them in 'Love's Labour's Lost' (act v. sc. 2) to the Nine Worthies. Further, they appear in the verses which precede the Low-German history of Alexander the Great (Lübeck, 1644), published by Lappenberg" (p. 336, etc. See also Warton, vol. iv. p. 151, note 2, Lond. 1824). They figure also in tapestry and paintings (Warton, ii. p. 44, note 9). This selection gives three heroes only very likely have originated in the 'Welsh Triads,' where the three Pagan, Jewish, and Christian trinities are enumerated as follows. Hector, Alexander, and Julius Cæsar; Joshua, David, and Judas Maccabæus; Arthur, Charlemagne, and Godfrey de Bouillon. For Godfrey is sometimes substituted Guy of Warwick." Dudley, Hist. of Prose Fiction, I. 269, 270.

The "Pageant of the Nine Worthies," out of which so much fuss is made in Shakspere's "Love's Labour's Lost," was represented in Queen Mary's time. "Each of the Worthies," says Strype, "made his speech, no doubt commencing as in the comedy, with 'I Pompey am,'" Ward.

Nine Years' Siege (of Montevideo). See Orde, Manuel.

Ningpo (ning'po'), or Ningpo-fu (ning'po'fū'). A seaport in the province of Chekiang, China, situated on the river Ningpo in lat. 29° 51′ N., long. 121° 32′ E. It is one of the treaty ports; has flourishing commerce; is an educational and religious center; and is noted for its tall tower and temple. It was taken by the British in 1841. Population, 250,000.

Ninias (nin'i-as), Saint. Lived about 400 A. D. A British missionary among the southern Picts. He built a church at Withern, or Whithorn, Galloway, in 397, and in 420, when driven to Ireland, is said to have founded a monastery at Cluoneymo.

Nino (nēn'yō), Pedro Alonso. Born in Moguer about 1455; died about 1505. A Spanish navigator. He was connected with several Portuguese expeditions to the West African coast; commanded a supply-fleet which sailed for Santo Domingo in 1496; and was with Columbus on his third voyage in 1498. Later he was associated with Cristobal Guerra in a trading expedition to the pearl coast (Venezuela). They left Spain about June, 1499, with a single small vessel, and returned richly laden with pearls and gold in April, 1500. This was the first financially profitable voyage to the American coast.

Ninon de Lenclos or L'Enclos. See Lenclos.

Ninove (nē'nō-vē'). A town in the province of East Flanders, Belgium, situated on the Dender 15 miles west of Brussels. Population (1890), 6,870.

Ninus (nī'nus). In Greek narratives, the founder of Nineveh (which he named after himself) and of the Assyrian empire, husband of Semiramis and father of Ninyas.

Ninus. An ancient name of Nineveh; also, a Roman town (of short duration) on the site of Nineveh.

Nio (nē'ō). An island in the monarchy of the Cyclades, Greece, 12 miles south-southwest of Naxos: the ancient Ios. Length, 11 miles.

Niobe (nī'ō-bē). [Gr. Νιόβη.] In Greek mythology, the daughter of Tantalus and wife of Amphion, king of Thebes. Proud of her numerous progeny, she provoked the anger of Apollo and Artemis by boasting over their mother Leto, who had but these two children. She was punished by seeing all her children die by the arrows of the two bright-deities. She herself was metamorphosed by Zeus into a stone which it is still sought to identify on the slope of Mount Sipylus, near Smyrna. This legend has afforded a fruitful subject for art, and was notably represented in a group attributed to Scopas, now best known from copies in the Uffizi at Florence. See Niobe group.

Niobe group. A celebrated collection of 18 antique statues, 12 of which were found in Rome in 1583, now in the Uffizi, Florence. They are good Roman copies of Greek originals ascribed with probability to Scopas, though by some to Praxiteles, representing Niobe horror-stricken in the midst of her children, whom are being struck to death by the unseen shafts of Apollo and Artemis. The central figure, Niobe, seeks to shelter, with her arm and her mantle, her youngest daughter, who kneels terrified at her feet. The other children, youths and maidens, are dead, dying, or fleeing, seeking to ward off the inevitable blow, or awaiting it with resistless fate. The existing group is incomplete: the original was probably arranged pyramidally for the decoration of a pediment.

Niobites (nī'ō-bīts). A branch of the Monophysites, founded by Stephanus Niobes in the 6th century, who opposed the views of the Severians. See Severians. Niobes taught that, according to strict Monophysite doctrine, the qualities of Christ's human nature were lost by its absorption into his divine nature. The Niobites soon modified their views and returned to the orthodox church.

Niobrara (nī-o-brā'rä). A river in northern Nebraska which joins the Missouri 34 miles west of Yankton. Length, about 450 miles.

Niort (nē-or'). The capital of the department of Deux-Sèvres, France, situated on the Sèvre-Niortaise in lat. 46° 19′ N., long. 0° 28′ W. It has large manufactures of gloves, and is noted for its onions. It has a museum of paintings, town hall, ruined castle, and Church of Notre Dame. It was often taken and retaken in the English and religious wars. Population (1891), 23,225.

Niphon. See Nippon.

Nipigon (nip'i-gon), or Nepigon (nep'i-gon), or Neepigon (nē'pi-gon), Lake. A lake in British North America, 55 miles north of Lake Superior, into which it discharges by Nipigon River. Length, about 70 miles.

Nipissing (nip'i-sing), Lake. A lake in the province of Ontario, Canada, northeast of Georgian Bay (in Lake Huron), into which it discharges through French River. Length, about 50 miles.

Nipmuc (nip'muk). [Pl. also Nipmucks. The name means 'fresh-water fishing-place.'] A general name for the North American Indian tribes of central Massachusetts, extending into Connecticut and Rhode Island. In 1675 their survivors of the King Philip war fled to Canada and to the Hudson River. Eliot's translation of the Bible was in the Natick dialect of the language spoken by the Nipmuc tribes. See Algonquian.

Nipmucks. See Nipmuc.

Nipper (nip'ėr), Susan. In Dickens's "Dombey and Son," a young maid in charge of Florence Dombey, noted for her sharp tongue. She marries Towlinson.

Nipple Top (nip'l top). An isolated peak of the Adirondacks, south of Mount Marcy. Height, 4,684 feet.

Nippon (nip-on'), or Niphon (nif-on'), or Nipon (nip-on'). ['Origin of the sun.'] A name wrongly used by foreigners for the main island of Japan. The Japanese call the entire empire Dai-Nippon or Nippon.

Nippur (nip-pör'). In ancient geography, a city of Babylonia, south of Babylon, midway between that place and Erech: the modern Niffer, situated on the Shatt en-Nil. The city existed in the earliest Babylonian period, an inscription of Naram-Sin (2750 B. C.) having been found there. Bel and Belitis were its special divinities. Nippur was visited by Sir Austen Henry Layard, who made some slight excavations and found several enameled coffins and other objects. It was excavated by an American expedition sent out by the University of Pennsylvania 1888-94 under the leadership of Dr. John P. Peters, and many inscriptions and other objects were found there. A portion of these are now in the Imperial Museum at Constantinople, and the remainder in the museum of the University of Pennsylvania. Excavations were resumed in 1893, and are now (1894) being carried on.

Nipur. See Nippur.

Niquirans. See Nicaraos.

Niris (nē'ris). Lake. A large salt lake in Farsistan, southern Persia, east of Shiraz.

Nirukta (ni-rök'tą). [Skt.: nis, out, and ukta, spoken, spoken out, loud, clear: nuk, as noun, explanation, etymological interpretation of a word.] In Sanskrit, the name of the fourth of six Vedangas (which see), or works or classes of works auxiliary to the Veda. It consists of the explanation of difficult Vedic words. As Yaska's Nirukti or 'explanation' of the Nighantu or Nighantavas is almost the only survivor of the class, the name is also used of that work. See Nighantu and Nirukti.

Nirukti (ni-rök'ti). [Skt., 'interpretation.'] In Sanskrit literature, an exposition in 12 books, by Yaska, of the Nighantu or Nighantavas. See Nighantu. "It is Yaska's work, the Nirukti, that we find the first general notions of grammar. Starting from the phonetic rules, advance was made first to a general view of phonetics, and thence to the remarkable parts of speech, whose general notions of inflection, derivation, and composition were recognized and distinguished, and manifold reflections were made upon the modifications thereby occasioned in the meaning of a root." (Weber.) As for Yaska's date, it can only be said that he belonged to the last stages of the Vedic period. His Nirukti has been edited by Roth.

Nirvana (nir-vä'nä). [Skt., 'blowing out' (as of a light), 'extinction.'] In Buddhism, the condition of a Buddha; the state to which the Buddhist saint aspires as the highest aim and highest good. Originally, doubtless, this was the extinction of existence, Buddhism being to show the way of escape from the miseries inseparably attached to life, and especially to life everlastingly renewed by transmigration, as held in India. But in later times this negation has been taken out of the other forms, and is explained as extinction of desire, passion, unrest, etc.

Nisæa (ni-sē'ą). In ancient geography, a region in Media (perhaps near the Caspian Gates), famous for its breed of horses.

> The Nisæan breed of horses continued in repute down to the times of Ammianus Marcellinus (xxiii. 6). They excelled all others in size and speed, and were generally the property of the Persian kings or nobles of the highest rank. The situation of the Nisæan plain from which they were derived, and their name is uncertain. According to Strabo, some placed it in Armenia; others, according to Sindas, in Persia. The general consent, however, of the best writers assigns it to Media. Here we know from the Behistun Inscription that there was a district Nisæa or Raadinsan, Herod., IV. 39, note.

Nisami. See Nizami.

Nisan (nī'san). [Heb. nisán, Babylonian nisánu.] The name of the first month of the Hebrew year, corresponding to March–April: after the exile (Esther iii. 7, Neh. ii. 1) corresponding to the Babylonian month Nisanu. Like the other names of the Hebrew months, it was derived from the Babylonians. The fact that it was the month in which the vernal equinox fell is attested by the cuneiform tablets read by Josephus.

Nisard (nē-zär'), Jean Marie Napoléon Désiré. Born March 20, 1806: died at Paris, March 26, 1888. A French historian of literature. He became a member of the French Academy in 1850. His chief work is "Histoire de la littérature française" (1844–61). He also wrote "Études d'histoire et de littérature" (1859), "Nouvelles Études" (1864), etc.

Niscemi (nis-chā'mē). A town in the province of Caltanissetta, Sicily, 43 miles southwest of Catania. Population (1881), 12,110.

Nish, or Nisch (nēsh), or Nissa (nēs'sä). The second largest city of Servia, situated on the Nishava in lat. 43° 18′ N., long. 21° 55′ E.: the ancient Naissus (Gr. Ναϊσσός). It was the birthplace of Constantine the Great. It was held by the Servians from the 12th to the 14th century, and then by the Turks until 1878. Here, in 269, the emperor Claudius II. defeated the Goths, 50,000 of whom are said to have perished; and here, in 1689, the Austrians under Louis of Baden defeated the Turks. The place was unsuccessfully besieged by the Servians in 1809. Population (1890), 19,857.

Nishadha (ni'shad-dha). In the Mahabharata, the country of Nala, inferred to be in the valley of the Sind, which traverses Gwalior state, Central India. On the Sind is Narwar, and local tradition connects this place with King Nala in a story bearing a striking resemblance to the poem of Nala.

Nishapur (nish-a-pör'). A city in Khorasan, Persia, 48 miles west of Meshhed: an important medieval city. Population, about 11,000.

Nishinam (nish'i-nam). The southern division of the Pujunan stock of North American Indians, comprising a number of tribes which formerly occupied the part of northern California between Yuba and Cosumne rivers. The name signifies 'people,' or 'our people.' See Pujunan.

Nisib. See Nizib.

Nisibis (nis'i-bis). [Gr. Νσιβις.] In ancient geography, a town in Mesopotamia, situated in lat. 37° N., long. 41° 15′ E.: the modern Nisibin or Nesibin. It was an Armenian, Parthian, Roman, and Persian stronghold; and was taken by Lucullus in 68 B. C., and afterward by Trajan.

Nismes. See Nimes.

Nisqually (niz'kwä-lē). A tribe of North American Indians which formerly lived on and about Nisqually River, Washington: now numbering 94 persons, on the Puyallup reservation, Washington. See Salishan.

Nisroch (nis'rok). In Bible history, an Assyrian deity in whose temple at Nineveh Sennacherib was murdered (2 Ki. xix. 37, Isa. xxxvii. 38). The name was formerly derived from Heb. nesher ('eagle'), and the deity was supposed to have been one of the eagle-headed genii frequently represented on Assyrian sculptures. The name has, however, not been found in cuneiform literature, and the conjecture of Joseph Halévy that it is an error for Nusku (which see) has been generally accepted.

Nissa. See Nish.

Nisus (nī'sus). [Gr. Νισος.] In Greek legend, a king of Megara, father of Scylla: changed to an eagle.

Nisyro (nē'sē-rō). A small volcanic island off the southwestern coast of Asia Minor, south of Cos and northwest of Rhodes: the ancient Nisyrus (Gr. Νισυρος).

Nith (nith). A river in southwestern Scotland which falls into Solway Firth 8 miles south of Dumfries. Length, 71 miles.

Nithard (nē'tär'). Lived in the first half of the 9th century. A Frankish historian, son of Bertha and grandson of Charles the Great.

Nitherohi. See Nicherou.

Nithsdale (niths'dāl). The valley of the Nith, principally in Dumfriesshire, Scotland.

Niti-Ghaut (nē'ti-gat'). One of the chief passes over the Himalaya from India to Tibet, situated about lat. 30° 50′ N., long. 79° 45′ E. Height, 17,000 feet.

Nitinaht (nē'tin-āt). A tribe of North American Indians, on Nitinaht Lake or Sound, Vancouver Island, British Columbia. Number, 269. See Aht.

Nitishastra (nē-ti-shās'tra). [Skt., 'conduct-treatise': niti, conduct, and shástra, instruction, treatise.] In Sanskrit, doctrine of political and social ethics, and then the name of a class of ethico-didactic treatises. These consist either of maxims in verse, or of fables and stories in prose with intermingled verse. See Bhartrihari, Hitopadesha, Panchatantra.

Nitocris (nī-tō'kris), or Nit-aker (nēt-ä'ker). ['The perfect.'] An Egyptian queen of the 6th dynasty (about 3000 B. C.). According to Manetho she was the noblest and most beautiful woman of her time, and built the third pyramid at Gizeh. This pyramid, which was built by Menkaura of the 4th dynasty, she doubtless renovated and enlarged. Herodotus also relates certain fabulous stories about her.

Nitocris. A queen of Babylon.

> Babylon was made impregnable; the river was paved with brick, and lined with huge walls; and those wonderful works of defence were constructed which Herodotus ascribes to queen Nitokris. This queen may have been the mother of Nabonidos, who died on the 5th of Nisan or March, B. C. 546, in the camp near Sippara.
> Sayce, Anc. Empires, p. 144.

Nitria (nit'ri-ä). The region of the Natron Lakes in Egypt, situated southwest of the delta of the Nile.

> The district Nitria is frequently mentioned by ancient authors: as by Strabo (xvii.) and by Pliny (xxxi. 46), and again by the Church writers of the fourth and following centuries, especially by those of them who speak of the monastic institutions of their own times. Around these dreary waters the monks of that time established themselves in great numbers — so many, indeed, that the emperor Valens thinking that he could find a more useful employment for them than that of reciting the Psalter, enlisted as many as five thousand of them in his legions. Taylor, Hist. Anc. Books, p. 217.

Nitzsch (nitsh), Gregor Wilhelm. Born at Wittenberg, Prussia, Nov. 22, 1790: died at Leipsic, July 22, 1861. A German philologist, son of K. L. Nitzsch: professor at Kiel 1827–52, and at Leipsic 1852–61. He wrote works on the Homeric poems, and defended the Homeric authorship of the Iliad and Odyssey.

Nitzsch, Karl Immanuel. Born at Borna, Saxony, Sept. 21, 1787: died at Berlin, Aug. 21, 1868. A German Protestant theologian, son of K. L. Nitzsch: professor at Berlin 1847–68. He was one of the founders of the "mediation theology." His chief works are "System der christlichen Lehre" ("System of Christian Doctrine," 1829), "Praktische Theologie" (1847–48).

Nitzsch, Karl Ludwig. Born at Wittenberg, Prussia, Aug. 6, 1751: died there, Dec. 5, 1831. A German Protestant theologian, professor at Wittenberg.

Nitzsch, Karl Wilhelm. Born at Zerbst, Anhalt, Dec. 22, 1818: died at Berlin, June 20, 1880. A German historian, son of G. W. Nitzsch: professor at Berlin 1872–80. He published works on Roman and medieval German history, etc.

Niuʻatea. See Mosonui.

Nivardus (ni-vär'dus) of Ghent. Lived in the 12th century. A Flemish priest, the author of the Latin poem "Ysengrimus," originally called "Reinardus Vulpes" (1148). See Reynard the Fox.

Here we have the names that afterwards entered so completely into the speech of Europe that the old French word for a fox, Goupil, was replaced by Renard. Reinaert, Reynard, or Reginhardt, meaning bold, hard, a hardened evil-doer whom there is no turning from his way. It is altogether out of this old story that the Fox has come by that name. Isegrim, the Wolf's name, is also Flemish — Isengrin meaning 'the iron helm.' The bear they named Bruno, Bruin, for the colour of his coat.
Morley, English Writers, VI. 316.

Nivelles (nē-vel'), Flem. Nyvel (nī'vel). A manufacturing town in the province of Brabant, Belgium, on the Thines, 17 miles south of Brussels. It contains the tomb of St. Gertrude, an ancient convent. Population (1890), 10,642.

Nivernais (nē-ver-nā'). An ancient government of France, corresponding nearly to the department of Nièvre. It was bounded by Burgundy on the northeast, east, and southeast, Bourbonnais on the south and southwest, Berry on the west, and Orléanais on the northwest. The most important portion of it was the duchy of Nevers.

Nivôse (nē-vōz'). [F., 'the snowy.] The name adopted in 1793 by the National Convention of the first French republic for the fourth month of the year. It consisted of 30 days, beginning in the years 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, 7 with Dec. 21; 4, 8, 9, 10, 11, 13, 14 with Dec. 22; and in 12 with Dec. 23. The Gregorian calendar came again into use after 10th Nivose, year 14 (Dec. 31, 1805).

Niza (nēt'sä). Marcos de. Born at Nice, Italy, about 1495: died in Mexico, 1542 (?). A Franciscan missionary, discoverer of Arizona. He is said to have labored successively in Peru, Nicaragua, and Mexico, and in the last-named country was provincial of his order. By order of the viceroy he penetrated northward from Culiacan in 1539, and in May of that year reached the region (probably (perhaps the Zuñi pueblos); but, some of his company being attacked by the Indians, he turned back, reaching Compostella about July. His exaggerated accounts (derived only from reports) of the riches of Cibola and its seven cities led to the expedition of Coronado (q.v.), which he accompanied as guide: the supposed wealthy cities were then shown to be ordinary pueblos, and the friar was sent back in disgrace. Niza's report, which has been frequently published, is full of improbabilities; but there can be no doubt that he crossed Sonora and part of Arizona.

Nizami (ni-zä-mē') (Abu Mohammed ben Yusuf Sheikh Nizam eddin). Born in 1141 at Tafrish, near Kum: lived the greater part of his life at Genje (Yelisavetpol), and died in 1202. One of the seven chief poets of Persia. He wrote a divan of 28,000 distichs, and five other great poems: "The Storehouse of Mysteries," "The Book of Alexander," "Khosrau and Shirin," "Majnun and Laila" (see Laila and Majnun), and "The Seven Fair Faces," the last consisting of seven stories told by the seven wives of Bahram Gur to amuse him. These five works are known as the "Five Treasures of Nizami." The third has been translated into German by Hammer-Purgstall (1812), the fourth into English by Atkinson (1836), the fifth into German by Erdmann (1835). See Bacher, "Nizamis Leben und Werke" (Gottingen, 1871).

Nizam's Dominions. See Hyderabad.

Nizhni-Novgorod. See Nijni-Novgorod.

Nizib, or Nisib (nē-zēb'). A place in the vilayet of Aleppo, Asiatic Turkey, situated near the Euphrates 64 miles northeast of Aleppo. Here, June 24, 1839, the Egyptians under Ibrahim Pasha defeated the Turks.

Nizza. See Nice (in France).

Njenji (njen'jē). A name given to the land of the Barotse by the Ovimbundu, and adopted by the Portuguese.

Njörd (nyērd). [ON. Njordhr.] In Old Norse mythology, the father of Frey and Freyja: most often mentioned in connection with the former as the dispenser of riches. He was by race a Vana, but came to dwell in Asgard. His wife was Skadi, the daughter of the giant Thjazi. He ruled the wind and calmed the sea, and hence was the god of sailors and fishermen. His dwelling was Noatun (ON. Noatun). Njord is in name the same as the goddess Nerthus of Tacitus, who is called by him Terra mater. Her cult and characteristics were almost identical with those of Frey.

Nkumbi (ngkōm'bē), or Bankumbi (bängk-kōm'bē), in Pg. Humbe. A Bantu tribe of southern Angola, West Africa, on the Kunene River. It belongs to the same cluster as the Ovimbundu and Ovambo; the dialect is called Lunkumbi.

No (nō). In the Old Testament, Thebes in Egypt.

Noah (nō'ä). [Heb., 'rest.'] In the Bible, a patriarch, the son of Lamech. He found favor with God because of his righteousness, and when God determined to destroy the world on account of its wickedness, he ordered Noah to build an ark, and take in it with him his family and one of all living animals. God then brought a flood, and upon its cessation Noah went forth from the ark, and from his family the world was repeopled. A similar account is found in cuneiform literature and in the early legends of various other peoples. See Hasis-Adra.

Noetians (nō-ē'shianz). The followers of Noetus (see below).

Noetus (nō-ē'tus). Born at Smyrna or Ephesus: died probably about 200 A. D. A heretic of Asia Minor who is said to have taught that "Christ was the Father, and that the Father was born, and suffered, and died."

The Trinitarian question, indeed, had already been agitated within a less extraordinary circle. Noetus, an Asiatic either of Smyrna or Ephesus had dwelt with such exclusive zeal on the unity of the Godhead as to absorb, as it were, the whole Trinity into the single individual and undistinguished Being. The one supreme and impassible Father united to himself the man Jesus, whom He had created, by an indistinct or a confunction that the divine unity was not destroyed. His adversaries drew the conclusion that, according to this blaspheming theory, the Father must have suffered on the cross; and the ignominious name of Patripassians ascribed to Noetus and to those who espoused his perilous secret. Milman, Hist. of Christianity, II. 360.

Nogaians (nō-gā'anz), or Nogais (nō-gīz'). A Turco-Tatar race living in southern Russia and Caucasia.

Norman Conquest in Italy. See the extract.

In 1016 a band of adventurous Normans settled at Aversa, near Naples. About twenty years later the elder sons of the Norman Tancred de Hautville came and joined their countrymen. The Norman knights fought as adventurers in quarrels of the land, and, being angered at denial of their proper share of spoil after they had helped the Greeks to take Messina and Syracuse from the Saracens, they turned on the Greeks themselves, and beat them out of nearly all Apulia, which they then divided into twelve parts for their own counts. They made Melfi their capital, and chose William Iron-Arm, the eldest son of Tancred, for their chief. Pope Leo brought the Sublime against these Norman conquerors. They beat the Sublime and seized the Pope, who yielded them then his investment with all lands they might acquire: an investment which they religiously interpreted as Heaven's own encouragement to future conquests. Robert Guiscard, fourth son of Tancred, when it was his turn to rule, conquered his way as far south as Reggio, and became Duke of Apulia and Calabria. In Little Greek, when he acknowledged himself the Pope's vassal, and was made the standard-bearer of the church. The standard-bearer then took Capua; besieged and took Salerno and Amalfi; held his own against all menace; and, in aid of the Pope Hildebrand, sacked Rome. The Norman Robert Guiscard, who thus played a master's part in Italy at the time of the Norman conquest of England, died in the same year as our William the Conqueror. His brother Roger, youngest son of Tancred de Hautville, who had set out in 1060 to take Sicily from the Saracens, and who had successively aided Robert by right of the strong, and he died, at the age of seventy. Great Count of Calabria and Sicily. His son, another Roger, when he had extended his father's estates, became, by failure of Guiscard's line, undisputed master of Apulia. This Roger, having taken, after a few years, Capua and Naples thought himself entitled to rank as a king. He was invested, therefore, by the Pope, in the year by the Grace of God of Sicily, Apulia, and Calabria, the helper and shield of Christians, son and heir of Roger, the Great Count." Palermo was this Roger's capital. Hence the kingdom kept its boundaries for more than seven centuries, and it was the birthplace of that earlier Italian poetry which afterwards exercised so manifest an influence over our literature. King Roger of Sicily died in 1154. His son and successor William the Bad had, in 1166, for son and successor William the Good, who married a daughter of our king Henry the Second, but died in 1189, leaving no children. Here ended the legitimate male line of descent from Tancred de Hautville.

He published a "Translation of Calvin's Institutes" (1561), and translated many of the psalms in the Psalter of Sternhold and Hopkins (1562), etc.

Norton Sound. An inlet of Bering Sea, on the west coast of Alaska.

Norumbega (nō-rum-bē'gā). A region on the Atlantic coast of North America, frequently mentioned in maps and writings of the 16th and 17th centuries. It was placed between Cape Breton and Florida, or narrowed to the northern part of that region, or sometimes placed within the present State of Maine. Various English and French explorers made journeys to Norumbega. It is disputed whether the name is of Indian origin. The river or city of Norumbega has been often identified with the Penobscot. Professor Horsford identified the lost city of Norumbega with Watertown, Massachusetts.

Norval (nôr'val), Young. In Home's play "Douglas," the son of Lady Randolph by a previous marriage with Douglas. His birth was concealed, and he was brought up as a shepherd by Old Norval, "the frugal swain," who found him. He is killed by Lord Randolph, who does not learn till too late that he is the son of Lady Randolph. The latter kills herself in despair. The part was a favorite one with John Kemble and others, and Macready played it to Mrs. Siddons's Lady Randolph.

Norway (nôr'wa). [ME. Norway, Norweg, AS. Norweg, earlier Northweg, Icel. Noregr, very rarely Norvegr, Norw. Dan. and Sw. Norge, G. Norwegen, F. Norvège, Mi. Norvegia, Northwagia, etc., lit. 'north way.' The first element has been erroneously referred to a mythical king Nor, and to the Icel. nor, a sea loch.] The northernmost country of Europe. Capital, Christiania. It is bounded by the Arctic Ocean on the north, Russia and Sweden on the east, the Skager Rack on the south, and the North Sea and the Atlantic and Arctic oceans on the west. It forms the western part of the Scandinavian peninsula, comprising also many islands. The coast-line is deeply indented by fiords. The country is traversed by a range of mountains including the Dovre Fjeld and the Jotun Fjelde, and the surface is generally elevated and mountainous. Among the leading industries are fisheries and lumber manufacture and trade. There are mines of silver, copper, iron, and nickel. The kingdom is divided into 20 amts (or provinces). The government is a limited hereditary monarchy. It is under the same sovereign with Sweden, with which it is united in foreign and diplomatic relations, but otherwise is independent. The king and a ministry form the executive, and the legislative power is vested in the storthing (or parliament), consisting of an upper and a lower house. The language is Norwegian. The established religion is Lutheran. Norway furnished a large part of the Northmen. The kingdom was consolidated under Harold the Fairhaired in the last part of the 9th century. Christianity was introduced in the end of the 10th century. The Scandinavian kingdoms were united from the union of Kalmar in 1397 until 1524. Norway was separated from Denmark and united to Sweden in 1814. Recent events are the constitutional struggles against the veto power of the king, and the movement toward greater or complete separation from Sweden. Area, 124,495 square miles. Population (1891), 2,001,000.

Norwegian (nôr-wē'jian). The Scandinavian language of Norway. Old Norwegian is preserved in runic inscriptions from the end of the Viking age in the 8th century to the end of the 14th century. Modern Norwegian dates from the end of the 14th century. At the time of the Reformation, Danish became the language of literature, a condition which prevails at the present time. Dano-Norwegian is, however, characteristically differentiated in pronunciation and vocabulary, and the old popular dialects have never died out.

Norwegian Sea (nôr-wē'jian sē). A name given in recent geography to that part of the North Atlantic Ocean which lies between Norway and Greenland.

Norwich (nor'ij). [ME. Norwich, AS. Northwīċ, north town.] The capital of Norfolk, England, and itself a county, situated on the Wensum in the lat. 52° 38′ N., long. 1° 17′ E.: the British Caer-Gwent, and the Gwenta of the Iceni. It has manufactures of mustard, starch, beer, iron, textiles, etc. The cathedral, begun in 1096, is said to preserve its Norman plan with less alteration than any other English church. The nave was completed in 1140, the clearstory of the choir was rebuilt in the 14th century, and the vaulting dates from the 15th century. The lower part of the west front and the tall slender spire rebuilt. The exterior is surrounded by a picturesque arcade of small arches and columns, above the lowest range of windows. In the interior the simple nave is Norman, except the Perpendicular windows and the vaulting. The choir is shut off from the nave by a solid screen surmounted by a tall organ, more sumptuous as an ornament than the view that it inclosure of the "coro" of a Spanish cathedral. The choir terminates in a polygonal cheyet, the only example of this form in an English cathedral of the first rank. The cloister-gallery is notably wide and high. The dimensions of the cathedral are 407 by 78 feet; length of transepts, 178; height of vaulting, 93½; height of spire, 315 feet. The Decorated cloister is large and beautiful, and the episcopal palace is in large part of the 14th century. The Church of St. Peter, Mancroft, the castle, and St. Andrew's Hall are also noteworthy. Norwich was a British and a Roman town; was burned by Sweyn; became the seat of the bishopric of East Anglia in 1094; received a colony of Flemish weavers in the 14th century; and became an important center for cloth manufactures. It was one of the leading towns in England in the 17th century. It returns two members to Parliament. Population (1891), 100,964.

Norwich (nor'wich). A city, one of the capitals of New London County, Connecticut, situated at the head of the Thames, 13 miles north of New London. Notitia Dignitatum (nō-tish'i-ā dig-ni-tā'tum). [L., 'list of dignities.'] See the extract.

> Its full title is, "Notitia dignitatum omnium, tam civilium quam militarium, in partibus Orientis et Occidentis." There can be little doubt that it was compiled in the first years of the fifth century, about the time of Alaric's first invasion of Italy. It is a complete Official Directory and Army List of the whole Roman Empire, and is of incalculable value for the decision of all sorts of questions, antiquarian and historical. For instance, the whole theory of the identification of the existing ruins with the former stations along the line of Hadrian's British Wall depends entirely on the mention in the Notitia of the names of the cohorts posted at those stations.

Noto, Val di. A former division of Sicily, in the southeastern part.

Notre Dame (nō'tr dām). [F., 'our Lady.'] A church at Paris, one of the most imposing and famous of cathedrals. The present structure was begun in 1165, but is chiefly of the 13th century. The façade, with its 3 large portals, its great roses, its gallery and arcades, and its twin square towers, is one of the two or three finest produced by Pointed architecture. The transept-fronts are unsurpassed in their way, and the long range of windows and flying buttresses of nave and choir is highly effective. The figure- and foliage-sculpture of the exterior is abundant and distinguished in style. The graceful rood-spire was built by Viollet-le-Duc in place of the original one. The interior, with nave and double aisles continued around the choir, measures 426 by 130 feet, and 110 high. The three roses retain their original glass, but the remainder of the glass is modern. The choir-screen is carved with interesting New Testament reliefs of the 14th century.

Notre Dame de Brou. A church at Bourg, France, in the latest florid-Pointed style, built by Margaret of Austria, between 1505 and 1536. The west front has three pediments and a richly carved porch; the nave is simple, but the choir is splendidly decorated as the mausoleum of Margaret of Austria, her husband Philibert I. Beau of Savoy, and her mother-in-law. The tombs, especially that of the prince, are adorned with a profusion of statues and minor sculptures. The carved rood-screen and choir-stalls are of rare excellence.

He made his first appearance at Paris in 1821, and from 1826–36 created all the most tenor parts at the Académie. He retired in 1837 on the appointment of Duprez, and went to Italy, and his mind being weakened by his disappointment and by jealousy of Duprez, he killed himself in a fit of delirium. Grove.

Nouvelle Héloïse, Julie ou la (jū-lē' ō lä nō-vel' ā-lō-ēz'). A sentimental novel by J. J. Rousseau, published in 1760.

This is a story told chiefly in the form of letters, and recounting the love of a noble young lady, Julie, for Saint-Preux, a man of low rank, with a kind of after-piece depicting Julie's married life with a respectable but prosaic free-thinker, M. de Wolmar. This famous book set the example first of the novel of sentiment; secondly, of the novel of picturesque-pastoral; and, in short, have been made to dethrone Rousseau from his position of teacher of Europe in point of sentiment and the picturesque, but they have had several successes. Hiebe's "La Nouvelle Héloïse" (but both sentimental and picturesque in tone) is not fairly owe their original popularity, yet "Julie" can not be called a good novel. Its direct narrative interest is but small, its characters but unusually drawn, or clothed in unusual words; its plot far too meagre. It is in isolated passages of description, and in the fervent passion which pervades parts of it, that its value, and for the same time its importance in the history of novel-writing, consist.

Novalis (nō-vā'lis): pseudonym of Friedrich von Hardenberg. Born on the paternal estate Wiederstedt, Mansfeld, Germany, May 2, 1772; died at Weissenfels, March 25, 1801. A German lyric poet. He studied jurisprudence at Jena, Leipsic, and Wittenberg. In 1794 he received a subordinate judicial position at Tennstadt in Thuringia, which, however, he soon abandoned to take up mining engineering as offering more rapid advancement. He died at the age of 29. His lyric poems are both secular and religious. "Hymnen an die Nacht" ("Hymns to Night") are lyrics in prose evoked by the death of Sophie von Kuhn, to whom he was engaged. A novel, "Heinrich von Ofterdingen," is fragmentary. As a writer he belongs to the so-called older Romantic school, of which he was the best lyric poet. His collected writings were published at Berlin, 1802, in 2 vols., to which were added a third (Berlin, 1846) and "Eine Nachlese" ("Gleanings"; Gotha, 1875). His correspondence with the Schlegels was published at Mainz in 1880.

Novara (nō-vä'rä). 1. A province in Piedmont, Italy, bordering on Switzerland. Area, 2,553 square miles. Population (1891), 732,104.—2. The capital of the province of Novara, 29 miles west of Milan: the ancient Novaria. It is a commercial, manufacturing, and railway center. The cathedral, founded in 396, but essentially of the 11th century, though injured by modern alterations and decoration, is one of the rare Italian examples of the union of church and towers. The Baptistery, essentially of the 11th century, though of much older foundation, is octagonal, 36 feet in diameter, with a domical vault. The ancient font of white marble is carved with pilasters, diaper-work, and sacked lions. Battles were fought in the French here, in 1495 and 1500; and in 1513 the Swiss defeated the French. In 1821 the Austrians defeated the Piedmontese insurgents. The most famous battle of Novara is that of March 23, 1849, when the latter were under Radetzky and the Piedmontese under Charles Albert. The latter immediately abdicated in favor of his son Victor Emmanuel. Population (1881), 19,000.

Novara Expedition. An Austrian scientific expedition around the world in the frigate Novara, 1857–59.

Nova Scotia (nō'vä skō'shiä). [L., 'New Scotland.'] A maritime province of the Dominion of Canada. Capital, Halifax. It consists mainly of a peninsula bounded by New Brunswick (separated by the Bay of Fundy) on the northwest, Northumberland Strait (separating it from Prince Edward Island) and the Gulf of St. Lawrence on the north, the Gut of Canso (separating it from Cape Breton) on the northeast, and the Atlantic on the south and southwest; but also includes the island of Cape Breton, not theast of the peninsula. Its surface is undulating, and is traversed by several ranges of hills. It has a long coast-line. There are mines of coal, gold, gypsum, and iron. The leading industries are fisheries, agriculture, and shipbuilding. It has its own colonies. Government is administered by a lieutenant-governor (with an executive council), a legislative council (21 members), and a legislative assembly (38 members). The province is represented in the Dominion Parliament by 10 senators and 20 members of the House of Commons. Nova Scotia was discovered by the Cabots in 1497. Unsuccessful attempts at settlement were made by Henry de Monts in 1604 and succeeding years. It was granted to Sir William Alexander in 1621, but was settled by the French later, forming part of Acadia. New Scotia baronets were created by Charles I. It was taken by England in 1654, given to France in 1667, and finally ceded to England in 1713. The French settlers (Acadians) were expelled in 1755. Cape Breton was ceded in 1763. New Brunswick was separated from it in 1784; Cape Breton was separated in 1784, but reunited in 1819. It joined the Dominion in 1867. Area, 20,550 square miles. Population (1891), 450,396.

Novatian (nō-vā'shiän), L. Novatianus (nō-vā-shi-ā'nus). Lived in the middle of the 3d century. A Roman presbyter, founder of the sect of the Novatians. He had himself consecrated bishop in opposition to Cornelius in 251. He is also called Novatus.

Novatians (nō-vā'shianz). In church history, a sect founded in the 3d century by Novatianus, or Novatus (see above), and by Novatus of Carthage. Novatianus denied that the church had power to absolve those who had committed the sin after Christian baptism had lapsed or fallen into idolatry in time of persecution; and his followers appear to have rejected the sacrament of penance, to have pushed penal sin, and denied the validity of Catholic baptism, considering themselves the true church. They assumed the name of Cathari, 'the Pure,' on the strength of their severity of Solitary life. In other respects they differed very little from the Catholics; and they were generally received back into communion on comparatively favorable terms. The sect continued to the 5th century.

Nova Zeelandia (nō'vä zē-lan'di-ä). [L., 'New Zealand.'] The name given by the Dutch to their settlements on the Essequibo River, Guiana, in 1596.

['New Land.'] An uninhabited double island in the Arctic Ocean, situated north of Russia and northwest of Siberia, belonging to the government of Archangel, Russia. It is separated into two parts by the narrow Matotchkin Shar, and is separated from the mainland by Kara Sea (and indirectly by Kara Strait). The coasts are deeply indented and mostly fringed by islets. Visited by hunters and fishermen. It was discovered by the English in the middle of the 16th century. Length, about 600 miles. Area, 35,000 square miles.

Novel (nov'el). A character in Wycherley's comedy "The Plain Dealer." He is a pert coxcomb "who, rather than not rail, will rail at the dead, whom none speak ill of; rather than not flatter, will flatter the poets of the age, whom none will flatter" (ii. 1). He is a great lover of novelties, and makes love to Olivia.

Novello (nō-vel'lō), Clara Anastasia. Born June 10, 1818. An English soprano singer, daughter of Vincent Novello. She studied at the Conservatoire in Paris in 1829, and made her first appearance at a concert in 1833. She was successful in concert-singing, but went to Italy in 1839, studied for the stage, and made her first appearance in "Semiramide" at Padua in 1841. She appeared in oratorio in England in 1841, and was even more acceptable in this than in the other two branches of her art. She ceased singing in public in 1860. She married Count Giglucci in 1843.

Novello, Joseph Alfred. Born 1810. A musicpublisher, son of Vincent Novello. He opened an establishment as a regular publisher of music in 1829, now known as "Novello, Ewer and Co.," continuing the publications began by his father, among them "Purcell's Sacred Music." He introduced Mendelssohn's works to the English public, and was prominent in furthering the interests of art and science, and also introduced a system of printing cheap music. He retired from business in 1856, and went to Italy, where he interested himself in studying the properties of water and the construction of ships.

Novello, Vincent. Born at London, Sept. 6, 1781: died at Nice, France, Aug. 9, 1861. An English composer and musical editor. In 1811 he began to publish music from his private house. This was the origin of the firm known later as Novello, Ewer and Co. See Novello, Joseph Alfred.

Novgorod (nov'gō-rod'). ['New town.'] 1. A government of Russia, surrounded by the governments of St. Petersburg, Olonetz, Vologda, Yaroslaff, Tver, and Pskoff. It contains the Valdai Hills in the south. Area, 47,236 square miles. Population (1890), 1,254,900.—2. The capital of Novgorod, situated on the Volkhoff, near Lake Ilmen, 100 miles south-southeast of St. Petersburg. The cathedral of St. Sophia, within the walls of the highly picturesque Kremlin, or citadel, was built in the middle of the 11th century by workmen from Constantinople; and, despite several restorations, it retains in great measure its original features. The dimensions are 105 by 110 feet, and 161 feet high to the apex of the central dome, which rests on 4 quadrangular piers. There are 4 flanking towers, and a sixth dome over the sacristy. The cathedral abounds in tombs of artistic and historical interest, and in rich church furniture, the carved stalls of the czar and the metropolitan and the old bronze doors with reliefs being especially noteworthy. The iconostasis bears several fine old icons. Novgorod is one of the oldest cities of Russia. It invited the Varangians for Russian defense about 862. In mediæval times it was one of the largest cities of Russia and one of the leading commercial centers of Europe, and was the capital of an independent state. It was brought under the dominion of Moscow about 1478, and was sacked by Ivan the Terrible in 1570. Its commercial importance has been entirely destroyed by the foundation of St. Petersburg and the opening of the railway. Population, 24,438.

Novgorod, Principality of. The principality which lay around the city of Novgorod, Russia, and was founded by Rurik the Varangian about 862. It was thus the nucleus of the Russian monarchy. Under Rurik's successor Oleg it was transferred to Kiefl. Novgorod continued as a "republican principality" with many privileges. Its territories included at its height Ingria, Karelia, part of Esthonia, and Livonia, Perm, Petchora, and large tracts in northern Russia. It was subdued by Ivan III. in 1470, and finally reduced by him, and its existence as a separate principality ended in 1478.

Nowell (nō'el), Alexander. Born in Lancashire, England, about 1507; died Feb., 1602. An English ecclesiastic. He was educated at Brasenose College Oxford. He was dean of St. Paul's, and prolocutor of the convocation that met in Jan., 1562, with the object of church reform when the articles were revised and reduced from 42 to 39. They did not, however, become law till 1571. He revised the larger church catechism, which was published separately in 1570.

Nowell, Robert. Born in Lancashire about 1520; died at Gray's Inn, London, Feb. 6, 1569. An English lawyer, a brother of Alexander Nowell. He obtained many good appointments, and became rich. He is principally remembered for a fund which he established by his will for charitable purposes to the largest. His brothers and John Towneley were his executors, and left a list of the persons to whom money was paid. This list came into the possession of the family of John Towneley, and was discovered by H. B. Knowles at Towneley Hall, and published in his report to the Historical Manuscripts' Commission in 1887. It contains important facts regarding Edmund Spenser, who was one of the poet scholars benefited from time to time. The list was printed by Grosart in 1871, entitled "The Spending of the Money of Robert Nowell of Reede Hall, Lancashire, etc."

Noyon (nwä-yôn'). A town in the department of Oise, France, situated on the Verse 58 miles north-northeast of Paris: the Roman Noviodunum Veromanduorum. The cathedral is a monument chiefly of the time of transition from Romanesque to Pointed. Both transepts have semicircular ends, and their front possesses a triple porch and twin towers. The round and pointed typeseoexist in this one building. At the west end of the nave is a very elaborate rose-window. Noyon was formerly the seat of a bishopric. It is the place where Charles the Great was crowned, where Hugh Capet was elected King of France, and where Calvin was born in 1509. It was the birthplace of Calvin. Population (1891), commune, 6,144.

Nozi. See Yanan.

Nozze Aldobrandini (not'se äl-dō-brän-dē'nē). [It., 'the Aldobrandini wedding'; referring to the subject of the painting.] A celebrated ancient wall-painting discovered 1606 in an excavation at Rome, and now in the Vatican. The subject is the preparation of a wedding. The bride, crowned with myrtle, is attended by her bridesmaid; the bridegroom is wreathed with ivy, and at one side three Graces dance, making sacrifice for the couple.

Nozze di Figaro (not'se dē fē'gä-rō). [It., 'Marriage of Figaro.'] An opera by Mozart, produced at Vienna in 1786. The libretto was adapted by Da Ponte from the "Mariage de Figaro" by Beaumarchais. It was played at Paris with Beaumarchais's words as "Le mariage de Figaro" in 1793, and as "Les noces de Figaro," words by Barbier and Curmi, in 1858. 4 Grove.

Nuba (nö'bä). A nation of the Nile-valley which occupies the stretch between the first and second cataracts, to which place it was brought from Meroe by Diocletian 15 centuries ago. After adopting Christianity, these Nubas or Nubians founded, under Silko, the Christian state of Dongola which lasted 6 centuries. They fell under Islam in 1820, and became subjects of the khedive in 1815. Lepsius says they are descendants of the ancient nation of Cush. In race they are mixed Negro and Hamitic. Their language has preserved a Negritic structure. The Nubas of Djebel Deyer, south of Kordofan, from whom the Dongolan Nubas descend, are still pure negroes. The dialects of Nuba are Mahas or Mahkol, Kenus, Dongola, and Fadidja. See Nuba-Fulah.

Nuba-Fulah (nö'bä-fö'lä). A group of African tribes and languages originated by Friedrich Muller and adopted by R. N. Cust, and misunderstood by many Africanists. It is not a race or a family of languages, but a grouping of tribes and languages of mixed type which the present state of knowledge and the ethnical nature will not permit to be assigned with certainty to the Negro or Negro-Hamites. It includes the Nubas, Kordofa, Nuba-Fulah, Tumale, Konjara, Kwafi, Masai, Berta, Kamanil, Funji, Kiéj, Nyam-Nyam, Mombuttu and the Fulahs of western Sudan. As knowledge progresses these connected tribes and languages will be subordinated to the Hamitic and Negro families. Some tribes belong by race rather to one, and by language rather to the other, family. Thus, the Nyam-Nyam and Mombuttu are rather Hamitic in race and customs, the Nyam-Nyam and Mombuttu more Negritic.

Nubar Pasha (nö'bär pash'ä). Born in 1825. An Egyptian statesman and diplomatist. He was ambassador at Vienna in 1854; minister of foreign affairs under Ismail Pasha 1867–76; and premier 1878–79 and 1884–88.

Nubia (nö'bi-ä). A region in Africa, bounded by Egypt (from al out the neighborhood of Assuan in lat. 24° N.) on the north, the Red Sea on the east, Abyssinia, Sennaar, and Kordofan on the south, and the desert on the west. It is not a political division. The chief portions are the valley of the Nile and Taka. It is nominally an Egyptian possession. The inhabitants are Nubas (of Negro race), Arabs, and Abyssinians. Nubia was subject to Ptolemies III., was part of the ancient Ethiopia; and was conquered by the forces of Mehemet Ali in 1820. The revolt under the Mahdi commenced here in 1883; and in 1885 the scene of the Egyptian expeditions in 1885–85. Area, estimated, 345,000 square miles. Population, estimated, from 1,000,000 to 1,500,000.

The Nubians, in spite of their black skins, are usually classed among the handsomest of mankind, just as the negroes are among the ugliest. They are tall, spare, and well proportioned. The hair is black and fairly straight, and there is very little of it on the body. The nostrils and lips are thin, the eyes dark, the nose somewhat aquiline. The flat feet with which they are credited are not a racial characteristic, but are due to their walking without shoes. As among the Egyptians, the second toe is longer than the first. Constitutionally, the Nubians are delicate, and are peculiarly sensitive to pneumonia. They suffer also from early decay of the teeth, and are not a long-lived race.

Nueva España. See New Spain.

Nueva Galicia (gä-lē'thē-ä). ['New Galicia.'] A primary division of colonial New Spain, or Mexico, long known officially as Reino de Nueva Galicia. Its limits varied at different times, but during the greater part of the 17th and 18th centuries it corresponded nearly to the modern states of Jalisco, Aguas Calientes, and Zacatecas, with a small part of San Luis Potosí; at an earlier period it also embraced, for a time, Durango and Sinaloa. It was partly conquered in 1529 by Nuñode Guzman. The audiencia of Guadalajara created in 1548, had jurisdiction over Nueva Galicia subject to appeal to the audiencia of Mexico. The governor, who was also president of the audience, was appointed by the king, but in military and treasury matters was subordinate to the viceroy of New Spain. In 1786 Nueva Galicia became the intendency of Guadalajara. After 1792 the Provincias Internas (Sonora, Sinaloa, Durango, Chihuahua, New Mexico, Coahuila, and Texas) were judicially subordinate to the audiencia of Guadalajara.

Nueva Vizcaya (vēth-kī'ä). ['New Biscay.'] A colonial division of New Spain, or Mexico, corresponding (nearly) to the modern states of Durango, Chihuahua, Sinaloa, Sonora, and the southern part of Coahuila. It was originally called copala. Francisco de Ibarra, who conquered a part of it between 1540 and 1554, named it Nueva Vizcaya, from an appellation which it retained until after the independence. During the 17th and most of the 18th century the governor of Nueva Vizcaya was subordinate to the viceroy of Mexico only in military and treasury affairs. In 1777 this region was included in the Provincias Internas.

Nuevo Leon (lā-ōn'). ['New Leon.'] 1. A division of colonial New Spain, or Mexico, corresponding to the present state of that name together with portions of San Luis Potosí and Tamaulipas. It was long known as the Nuevo Reino de Leon. In 1786 it was attached to the intendency of San Luis Potosí.

2. A state in northeastern Mexico, surrounded by the states of Coahuila, Tamaulipas, and San Luis Potosí. Capital, Monterey. Area, 23,980 square miles. Population (1891), 271,987.

Numbers (num'bėrz). The fourth book of the Old Testament: so called because it begins with an account of the numbering of the Israelites in the beginning of the second year after they left Egypt. It includes part of the history of the Israelites during their wanderings.

Numenius (nū-mē'ni-us). [Gr. Noumēnios.] Born at Apamea, Syria; lived in the second half of the 2d century. A Neo-Pythagorean philosopher, forerunner of Neoplatonism.

His leading principle was the belief that Plato, who formed, as he thought, a sort of connecting bond between Pythagoras and Socrates, really preached in a Greek form the revealed doctrines of the Jewish legislator. And he went so far as to say, "What is Plato but Moses talking Attic Greek?" But he applied his Pythagorean principles also to the identification of Egyptian, Persian, and even Brahminical visions. And without confounding our Saviour by name, he made the Gospels the subjects of philosophical allegories not unlike those which Philo spun from the Pentateuch. Weller, Hist. of the Lit. of Anc. Greece. (III. 1-2. Donaldson.)

Numerianus (nū-mē-ri-ā'nus), Marcus Aurelius. Roman emperor (conjointly with his brother Carinus) in 283 A. D. He accompanied his father, the emperor Carus, on an expedition against the Persians in 283, while Carinus remained behind as governor of the western provinces. The death of his father during the expedition elevated him and his brother to the throne. He, however, died in camp while returning from the East. Aper, the prefect of the pretorians, his father-in-law, was suspected of encompassing his death, with the intention of making himself emperor. Arrius Aper was stabbed by Diocletian who assumed the purple.

Numidia (nū-mid'i-ä). [L. Numidia, Gr. Nomadia, from Numidæ, Gr. reflex Nomades, the inhabitants, prop. Nomades, wanderers, nomads.] In ancient geography, a country of northern Africa, corresponding nearly to the modern Algeria. It was bounded by the Mediterranean on the north, the territory of Carthage on the east, the desert on the south, and Mauretania on the west. The Massylii in the east and the Massesyli in the west were united in a kingdom under Masinissa. This was dismembered after the defeat of Jugurtha in 106 B. C., and the eastern part became a Roman province shortly after the death of its king Juba in 46 B. C.

Nuñez Vela (nōōn'yäth vä'lä). Blasco. Born at Avila about 1490: died near Quito, Jan. 18, 1546. First viceroy of Peru. After holding various civil and military offices in Spain, he was appointed viceroy in 1543 with the special mission of promulgating the "New Laws" (which see). He reached Lima in March, 1544. His unscrupulous policy and low character soon manifested, and a revolt broke out, headed by Gonzalo Pizarro. In Sept. the viceroy killed the factor Suarez de Carbajal in an altercation, was arrested by the audience, and was sent to Jauja under the ambitors, Alvarez, to be taken to Spain for trial. While still near the coast Alvarez released him: he landed at Tumbez and began to collect forces against Pizarro, but the latter forced him to retreat through Quito to Popayan. Reinforced there by Benalcazar and others, he returned as far as Quito, but was defeated by Pizarro and killed in the battle of Anaquito.

Nun's Priest's Tale, The. One of Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales." It is taken from the "Roman du Renart," and is the story of Chanticleer who escaped from the jaws of the fox by his cunning in making the latter open his mouth to speak. It is modernized by Dryden as "The Cock and the Fox," in a loose paraphrase. See Second Nun's Tale.

Nuremberg (nū' rem-bėrg). G. Nürnberg (nürn'berg). A city in Middle Franconia, Bavaria, situated on the Pegnitz in lat. 49° 27′ N., long. 11° 5′ E. It is the leading manufacturing and commercial city of Bavaria; is noted for its manufactures of Nuremberg wares (including toys and fancy articles), pencils, machinery, ultramarine, beer, etc.; and is the chief mart on the Continent for hops. It is remarkable for its medieval appearance. The Burg, or castle, founded in the 11th century by Conrad II., and restored as a royal residence in the present century, is a picturesque structure with towers of different heights and forms and high roofs. In the Heidenthurm there are two Romanesque chapels, one over the other. The Germanic National Museum is a historical collection founded in 1852, and, besides illustrating costumes, arms and armor, and the industrial and minor arts, includes an unexcelled gallery of German 15th- and 16th-century paintings. The museum occupies a 14th-century Carthusian monastery, with a handsome church and fraceried cloister, and also an Augustinian monastery, rebuilt adjoining. Among the other features of Nuremberg are the walls and towers, churches of St. Lawrence, St. Sebaldus, and St. Jacob, Frauenkirche, fountain (Schöne Brunnen), and Rathaus. The city existed as early as 1050; was developed under the Hohenstaufens; was made a free imperial city in 1219; and became in the 15th and 16th centuries a great center of trade, art, science, and literature. The Reformation was introduced in 1525. It suffered severely in the Thirty Years' War. In 1806 it was annexed to Bavaria. Population (1890), 142,590.

Nutabes (nō-tā-bās'). An extinct tribe of South American Indians who occupied part of the region included in the present department of Antioquia, Colombia, on the right side of the Cauca, between that river and the Porcé. They were hardly less advanced in civilization than the Chibchas, but were less warlike and had no hereditary chiefs. Their clothing was of cotton, and they were skilled in making small figures of gold. Many of these figures were deposited in their tombs (huacas), and are still found: in 1833 gold to the amount of $18,000 was found in a single huaca. Nothing is known of their linguistic affinities.

Nut-brown Maid, The. A ballad belonging to the end of the 15th century. Prior took it for the foundation of his "Henry and Emma." The "nut-brown maid" proclaims her faithful love, and at last tells her at the end of every second stanza that he is a banished man. By saying at the end of the intervening stanza "I love but you alone," her love and meekness prevail; and he consoles her in the end by saying

"Thus have ye won an erles son,
And not a banyssheed man."

We owe the preservation of this beautiful old ballad to "Arnold's Chronicle," of which the earliest edition is thought to have been printed in 1502. In Lanehan's account of Elizabeth's visit to Kenilworth, the "Nut-brown Maid" is mentioned as a book by itself, and there is said to be at Oxford a list of books offered for sale at that place in 1620, among which is the "Nobleness of a Maydy," price one penny; still, the ballad is not known to exist at present in any other ancient form than that of the Chronicle. We have no means of determining the date of the composition, but Percy has justly remarked that it is not probable that an antiquary would have inserted a piece in his historical collections which he knew to be modern. The language is that of the time at which it was printed.

Child's Ballads, IV. 143.

Nutmeg State. A name given to Connecticut, from its alleged manufacture of wooden nutmegs.

Nuttall (nut'al), Thomas. Born at Settle, Yorkshire, England, 1786: died at St. Helen's, Lancashire, England, Sept. 10, 1859. An Anglo-American botanist and ornithologist. Nyam-Nyam (nyäm-nyäm'), or Sandeh (sän'de). A great African nation, consisting of numerous petty tribes, dwelling in the basins of the Welle and Shari rivers. They number about 2,000,000. They are called Nyam-Nyam ('eaters,' 'cannibals') by the Bùkas, and other neighbors give them other names; their own name is Sandeh. They are negroes in color and hair, and have short legs and round heads and faces. They tattoo their faces as a tribal mark, and their chests and arms for ornamentation. They wear skins and bark cloth, and are clever workmen, hunters, and musicians. The women do the tilling. Many, but not all, are or were cannibals. Their weapons are the lance, shield, bow and arrows, and throwing-knife.

Nyamwezi (nyä-mwā′zē), or Wanyamwezi (wä-nyä-mwā′zē). A Bantu nation of German East Africa. It inhabits a long stretch of the undulating and fertile plateau between Lake Victoria, Ukonongo, and Uyanzi, including Usukuma in the north, Unyanyembe and Ugunda in the south, and also the Arab settlement Tabora. In a more limited sense, Unyamwezi, their country, is placed between Usukuma and Unyanyembe. The people are medium-sized, and have generally Bantu features; but long noses and occasionally curly instead of woolly hair seem to indicate mixture. They use lances, shields, and bows and arrows as weapons. Unilaunganja is said to have been the first name of the country, and Mwezi the founder of the kingdom, which became famous as the semi-fabulous Monemugi of old Portuguese authors. See Mirambo and Speke.

Nyaya (nyä′ya). [Skt.: ni, into, and áya, a derivative of i, go; and hence 'entering,' 'analytical investigation.'] One of the six systems of Hindu philosophy. It is ascribed to a Gotama or Gautama. It was intended to furnish a correct method of philosophical inquiry into all the objects and subjects of human knowledge, including the process of reasoning and laws of thought. It begins by propounding 16 topics, of which the first is the means by which the right measure of any subject is to be obtained. The processes by which true knowledge is attained are declared to be (1) sense perception; (2) inference; (3) comparison; (4) verbal authority or trustworthy testimony, including Vedic revelation. Inference is divided into 5 members: (1) the proposition stated hypothetically; (2) the reason; (3) the example or major premise; (4) the application of the reason or minor premise; (5) the conclusion, or the restatement of the proposition as proved. The terms "invariable pervasion" or "concomitance," "pervader" or "invariably pervading attribute," and "invariably pervaded" are used in making a universal affirmation or in attaining universal distribution. The second topic is those points about which correct knowledge is to be obtained, viz.: (1) soul; (2) body; (3) senses; (4) objects of sense; (5) understanding; (6) mind; (7) activity; (8) faults; (9) transmigration; (10) consequences or fruits of action; (11) pain; (12) emancipation. The other 14 topics are an enumeration of the regular stages of a controversy, including (1) doubt about the point to be discussed, (2) a motive for discussing it; (3) a familiar example in order that a conclusion may be arrived at; (4) the argument of the objector with its 5 members; (5) the refutation, and ascertainment of the true stated of the case; (6) further controversy; (7) mere wrangling; (8) cavilling; (9) fallacious reasoning; (10) quibbling artifices; (11) futile replies; after which follows (12) the putting an end to all discussion. After discussing his 16 topics Gotama states how deliverance from repeated births is to be attained. See Williams, "Indian Wisdom," IV., and the translations by Ballantyne and Colebrooke.

Nyborg (nü′borg). A seaport in the province of Svendborg, Denmark, in the island of Fünen, situated on the Great Belt in lat. 55° 19′ N., long. 10° 48′ E. Nydia (nid′i-ä). A blind girl in Bulwer's "Last Days of Pompeii."

> Nydia, like Sir Walter Scott's Fenella, is borrowed from Mignon, one of the most poetical creations of its great inventor. Both is highly born and delicately nurtured, stolen in infancy from her parents, sold to a savage taskmaster, and rescued from slavery by the hero. Her blindness is beautifully managed, never forgotten and never obtruded. Senior, Essays on Fiction, p. 367.

Nyema (nyä′mä), or Manyema (mä-nyä′mä). A Bantu tribe of the Kongo State, included in the concession of the Katanga Company, settled between the Lualaba, Nyangwe, and Lake Tanganyika. They call themselves Wenya or Wagenya. Their country is one of the finest in the world for scenery and vegetation, but is unhealthy. The people have a good physique; wear an apron made of skin or grass-cloth; use lances and huge shields; keep their villages clean; and show considerable intelligence and industry; but they are addicted to cannibalism and intertribal wars. Also Manyirema.

Nyerup (nü′er-öp), Rasmus. Born in Fünen, Denmark, March 12, 1759; died June 28, 1829. A noted Danish scholar and literary historian. He published, with Rahbek and Abrahamson, "Selected Danish Songs from the Middle Ages" (1812-14), and other works on Danish literature.

Obermann (ō-ber-mān'). A psychological romance by Senancour, published in 1804. It is so called from the name of the hero, who is a dreamer striving to escape from the actual. He lives in a solitary valley, and writes melancholy speculative letters on all kinds of problems. Sainte-Beuve revived the book by bringing out a new edition in 1833, when it appealed to the public taste more perhaps than on its original production.

Oberon (ō'be-ron). 1. In medieval mythology, the king of the fairies. He first appears in the old French romance "Huon de Bordeaux" as the son of Julius Cæsar and Morgan the Fay, and is thus connected with the Arthurian genealogy. Shakspere introduces him in the "Midsummer Night's Dream."

He resembles in many respects the Elberich in the story of Otnit. Grimm connects the name with Alp, Alb,—elf, and he may be regarded as an importation from the Teutonic Pantheon, invested, however, with many Keltic and Christian as well as Asiatic attributes. M. Longnon, in the Romania, vol. iii, has carefully worked out the probable connection of Huon of the Bordeaux cycle with the Balder. Whatever the historical element in the romance, Oberon became an essential part in it as early as the thirteenth century. Dunlop, Hist. of Prose Fiction, I. 296, note.

Observations of Bel. See the extract.

> The standard work on astronomy, as has already been noted, was that called "The Observations of Bel," compiled originally for the library of Sargon I. at Accad. Additions were made to it from time to time, the chief object of the work being to note the events which happened after each celestial phenomenon. Thus the occurrences which at different periods followed a solar eclipse on a particular day were all duly inscribed under the text and piled as it were, one upon the other. The table of contents prefixed to the work showed that it treated of various matters — eclipses of the sun and moon, the conjunction of the sun and moon, the phases of Venus and Mars, the position of the pole-star, the changes of the weather, the appearance of comets, or, as they are called, "stars with a tail behind and a corona in front," and the like.

Occam, or Ockham (ok'am), William of. Born at Ockham, Surrey, England, about 1270; died at Munich, April 7, 1347. An English scholastic philosopher, the reviver of nominalism. He was called the "Invincible Doctor," the "Singular Doctor," or "Princeps Nominalium," and in the age following his own "Venerabilis Inceptor," as if he had not actually taken his degree. He was a great advocate of the rule of poverty of the Franciscan order, to which he belonged, and a strong defender of the state against the pretensions of the papacy. He was lecturer in the University of Paris; aided Louis of Bavaria in his contest with Pope John XXII.; and opposed the latter in the Franciscan assembly at Perugia in 1322. All his teachings depend upon the logical doctrine that generality belongs only to the significations of signs (such as words). The conceptions of the mind are, according to him, objects in themselves individual, but mentally significative of classes. These principles are carried into every department of logic metaphysics, and theology, where their general result is that nothing can be discovered by reason, but all must rest upon faith. Occamism thus prepared the way for the overthrow of scholasticism by arguing that little of importance to man could be learned by scholastic methods. The Occamistic writings exhibit the scholastic faults of triviality, prolixity, and formality in a higher degree than those of any other school. His chief works are "Tractatus Logicalis," "Tractatus de sacramentalibus," "Super quatuor libros sententiarum expositio aurea."

Occleve (ok'klēv), Thomas. [ME. Occleve, sometimes with unorig. aspirate Hoccleve; prob. of local origin; AS. as if Ācclif*, pl. Ācclafu*, Ācclifu*.] Born about 1370; died about 1454. An English poet and lawyer. He lived at Chester's Inn in the Strand in his youth, and knew Chaucer. His chief poem is "De regimine principum," a new version of "The Governaunce of Princes." Some others we are sure, or nearly sure, that he himself has written it.

Oceanus (ō-sē'a-nus). [Gr. Ὠκεανός.] 1. According to ancient geographical ideas, a swift and unbounded stream encircling all the known lands and seas; later, the outer sea, or Atlantic Ocean. The progress of geographical discovery produced corresponding modifications of this early conception.

> The key to the confused geography of the "Germania," as regards north-western Germany, will be found in a comparison of the passages in which he [Tacitus] mentions the "Oceanus," or ocean-current, as distinguished from the seas which are crossed or sailed on. The Cimbrian Chersonese, the Sinus Codanus, and the Danish Isles and southern Scandinavia, are described as being actually encircled by "Oceanus."

2. In classical mythology, the ocean stream personified. He was the husband of Tethys.

Ochail (ō-kā-il'lē). A celebrated corsair. See the extract.

> Though Dragut was no more, Ochiali — as the Christians called 'Ali El-Uluji, 'the Renegade' (the Turks dubbed him Fartax, 'scurvied' from his complaint) — was following successfully in his chief's steps. Born at Constelli (Licasto[?]) in Calabria about 1508, Ochiali was to have been a priest, but his capture by the Turks turned him to the more exciting career of a corsair. So earlier the seige of Malta he successfully harbored's son Hasan as pasha or Beglerbeg of Algiers (1548), and one of his first acts was to retake Tunis (all but the Goletta) in the name of Sultan Selim II., who, to the unspeakable loss of the Mohammedan world, had in 1566 succeeded his great father Suleyman. In July, 1570, off Alicata, on the southern coast of Sicily, Ochiali surrounded four galleys of the Religion — they then possessed but five — and took three of them, including the flag-ship, which Saint Clement, the general of the galleys, abandoned in order to throw himself and his treasure on shore at Montechiaro.

Odysseus (ō-dis'ūs), L. Ulysses (ū-lis'ēz) or Ulixes (ū-lik'sēz). [Gr. Ὀδυσσεύς.] In Greek legend, a king of Ithaca, one of the heroes of the Trojan war, especially famous for his wanderings and exploits on the homeward voyage. See Odyssey. He was the son of Laertes, the husband of Penelope, and the father of Telemachus. His intelligent courage, practical wisdom, and resourcefulness in all emergencies make him the ideal representative of the Ionic Greek race.

Odyssey (od'i-si). An epic poem, attributed to Homer, in which are celebrated the adventures of Odysseus (Ulysses) during ten years of wandering, spent in repeated endeavors to return to Ithaca, his native island, after the close of the Trojan war. Some critics, both ancient and modern, who have acknowledged the Homeric origin of the Iliad, attribute the Odyssey to a different author. (See Homer.) The Odyssey is the only complete surviving example of a whole class of epics, called Nostoi, describing the return voyages of various Greek heroes from Troy. (See Iliad.) It represents Odysseus as being thrown by a storm at the outset of his voyage on the coast of Thrace, north of the island of Lemnos. He plundered the town of Ismarus, belonging to the Cicones, where he lost a number of his followers. Next he was driven to the country of the Lotophagi on the coast of Libya; then to the goat-island, which lay a day's voyage to the north of the Lotophagi. Leaving all his ships behind, except one, he sailed to the neighboring island of the Cyclopes (the western coast of Sicily), where with twelve companions he entered the cave of the Cyclops Polyphemus, a son of Poseidon and Thoosa. Polyphemus devoured six of the intruders, and kept Odysseus and the others prisoners. Odysseus made Polyphemus drunk with wine, put out his eye with a burning pole, and escaped with his companions by concealing himself and them under the bellies of the sheep which the Cyclops let out of his cave. Thenceforth, however, he was pursued by the anger of Poseidon, who sought to revenge the injury inflicted on his son. After further adventures, in which he lost all his ships except one, he arrived at the island of Æea, inhabited by the sorceress Circe, by her instance he made a journey to Hades (Orcus), sailed by the island of the Sirens near the west coast of Italy, passed between Scylla and Charybdis, and arrived at Thrinacia, the island of Helios. Here his companions killed some of the sacred oxen belonging to Helios, with the result that they were all drowned in a shipwreck after leaving the island. Odysseus escaped with his life to the island of Ogygia, inhabited by the nymph Calypso, with whom he lived 8 years. Leaving Ogygia on a raft built with the assistance of the nymph, he was again shipwrecked, but reached safely the island of the Phæacians, where he was discovered by Nausicaa, the daughter of Alcinous and Arete. He was carried to Ithaca by the hospitable Phæacians, and after slaying the suitors of his wife Penelope, who had been wasting his property during his absence, was welcomed by his wife and subjects.

Though there was controversy in old days about the priority of the Iliad, it now seems settled that the Iliad must look upon the Odyssey as a later poem — how much later it is impossible to say. The limits assigned have varied from those who believe it the work of the same author in old age to those who place it two centuries later (as M. É. Burnouf does), owing to the difference of its plan and style. But, as Bonitz says, if not composed in the middle age of Homer, it was composed in the old age of Greek epic poetry, when the creative power was diminishing, but that of ordering and arranging had become more developed. The unity of the Odyssey is skillfully conceived, and on the whole artistically carried out, even though modern acuteness has found flaws in its sutures. But critics seem agreed that the elements of the Odyssey were not recent and disconnected lays, but themselves epics of considerable length, one on the return of Odysseus, another on the adventures of Telemachus, and these are clearly blended. Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I. 78.

Œnomaus (ē-nō-mā'us). [Gr. Οἰνόμαος.] In Greek legend, a king in Elis, son of Ares, and father of Hippodameia by the Pleiad Sterope. He was also said to be the son of Ares and Sterope.

An oracle had declared that he should die if his daughter should marry, and he therefore made it a condition that those who came to solicit her hand for Hippodameia in hand should contend with himself in the chariot-race, and he who conquered should receive her, whereas those that were conquered should suffer death. The race-course extended from Pisa to the altar of Poseidon on the Corinthian isthmus. At the moment when a suitor started with Hippodameia, Œnomaus sacrificed a ram to Zeus at Pisa, and then armed himself and hastened with his swift chariot and four horses, guided by Myrtilus, after the suitor. He thus overtook many a lover, whom he put to death, until Pelops, the son of Tantalus, came to Pisa. Pelops bribed Myrtilus, and, using the horses which he had received from Poseidon, he succeeded in reaching the goal before Œnomaus, who in despair made away with himself. Smith, Dict.

Œnophyta (ē-nof'i-tā). [Gr. Οἰνόφυτα.] In ancient geography, a place in Bœotia, Greece, about 23 miles north of Athens. Here, in 456 B. C., the Athenians under Myronides defeated the Bœotians.

Ogham. In Celtic mythology. See the extracts.

The word "ogham," in modern Irish, stands for the occult sciences; and, according to Lucian, Ogmius was painted in the second century as a Herculean Mercury, old, in a lion's skin, with a club in his right hand, a bent bow in his left, the ears of his worshippers bound by a chain of gold and amber to his tongue.

Morley, English Writers, I. 168.

He is signalized in Irish mythology as the inventor of writing, that is to say of the Ogam alphabet, for ogham being much skilled in dialects and in poetry, it was he, we are told, who invented the ogam, to provide signs for secret speech with kindred, and which was used designed to be kept from the vulgar and people in general. The inventive attributed to Ogma as inventor of comparatively late age, for there was nothing cryptic about the Ogam alphabet; but the allusion to Ogma's skill in poetry and dialects is important, especially as there was not only a mode of writing called Ogam, but also a kind of pedantic jargon which bore that name. Now Irish legend will have it that the Ogam was so called from the name of Ogma, which is etymologically impossible.

Rhys, Celtic Heathendom, p. 18.

Ogier (ō-zhyā'), Le Prieur. The name under which Jean Louis Guez, Seigneur de Balzac, published his "Apology."

Ogier, the Dane, or Ogier le Danois or Ogier de Danemarcke, Dan. Holger Danske or Olger Dansk. In medieval legend, one of the paladins of Charlemagne: the subject of French chansons de geste of the 12th and 13th centuries. These are based on older forms. His name is also given as Oger, Ager, and Autcar. In Danish romance he figures as a champion of the Christian faith. The legend also wove a chanson de geste of the same cycle. Ogier, the son of Geoffrey the king of Denmark, is brought up at the court of Charlemagne, and at one period of the romance assumes the crown of Denmark; but he leaves it and returns to Charlemagne, becoming one of his chief paladins. After a successful and warlike career, at the age of 100 years he is carried away to the Isle of Avalon by Morgan le Fay, who restores him to youth with entire forgetfulness of the world, but sends him back after 200 years have passed, to defend Europe against the Asiatic invaders and restoring the old spirit of knighthood, he returns to Avalon, where he sleeps, and whence he may again awake and return to defend the right. As Holger Danske, he has been raised to the position of Danish national hero.

Ogilby (ō'gl-bi), John. Born at Edinburgh, 1600; died at London, Sept. 4, 1676. A Scottish poet, translator, and compiler of atlases. He published "America, being the most accurate Description of the New World" (London, 1671).

O'Higgins (ō-hig'inz; Sp. pron. ō-ē'gens), Ambrosio. Born in County Meath, Ireland, about 1720; died at Lima, Peru, March 18, 1801. A Spanish administrator, marquis of Osorno from 1796. His real name was Ambrosio Higgins. He was educated in Spain, and when a young man went to Chile as a trader. Obtaining a commission in the army, he rose rapidly, was captain-general of Chile 1778–86, and was viceroy of Peru from June, 1796, until his death. He was an excellent ruler.

O'Higgins, Bernardo. Born at Chillan, Aug. 20, 1776; died at Lima, Peru, Oct. 24, 1842. A Chilian general and statesman, natural son of Ambrosio O'Higgins. He was educated in England, where he derived republican ideas from Miranda: was a prominent military leader of the Chilean patriots from 1810; and on the deposition of Carrera, 1813, was made commander of the army. Carrera opposed him, and a civil war was prevented only by the common danger from the Spaniards. The combined forces of Carrera and O'Higgins were defeated at Rancagua Oct. 1 and 2, 1814, and they fled across the Andes. O'Higgins joined San Martin in the invasion of Chile, and his charge decided the victory of Chacabuco Feb. 12, 1817. He and San Martin entered Santiago having refused the office O'Higgins was named supreme director of Chile with dictatorial powers. The independence of the country was formally proclaimed Feb. 12, 1818, and was decided by the victory of Maipo, April 5, 1818. O'Higgins's rule was very progressive. He was forced to resign by a revolution, Jan. 28, 1823, and retired to Peru.

Ohio (ō-hī'ō). The principal left-hand tributary of the Mississippi. It is formed by the junction of the Allegheny and Monongahela at Pittsburg; flows through western Pennsylvania; forms the boundary between Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois on the north and northwest, and West Virginia and Kentucky on the south and southeast; and joins the Mississippi at Cairo. Its chief tributaries are the Muskingum, Scioto, Miami, and Wabash on the north, and the Great Kanawha, Big Sandy, Licking, Kentucky, Green, Cumberland, and Tennessee on the south. The chief places on its banks are Pittsburg, Wheeling, Portsmouth, Cincinnati, Covington, Newport, Madison, Louisville, New Albany, and Evansville. Its rapids at Louisville are avoided by a canal. Length, about 975 miles, all navigable. Total length (with the Allegheny), about 1,300 miles.

Ohio. One of the South Central States of the United States of America, extending from lat. 38° 27′ to 41° 57′ N., and from long. 80° 34′ to 84° 49′ W. Capital, Columbus; chief cities, Cincinnati and Cleveland. It is bounded by Michigan and Lake Erie on the north, Pennsylvania and West Virginia (separated by the Ohio) on the east, Kentucky (separated by the Ohio) on the south, and Indiana on the west. The surface is undulating. It is the fourth State in population; first in value of farms, production of wool, and manufacture of agricultural machinery; and one of the chief manufacturing States. Among the chief products are coal, iron ore, wool, live stock, dairy produce, flour, pork, coal, iron, salt, and petroleum. It has 88 counties, sends 2 senators and 21 representatives to Congress, and has 23 electoral votes. It was discovered by the French under La Salle at the end of the 17th century; was claimed by both the French and the English; was ceded to Great Britain in 1763; passed to the United States in 1783 (with the exception of reserves held by Connecticut and Virginia until 1800); formed part of the Northwest Territory in 1787; was settled at Marietta in 1788; was the scene of Indian warfare 1790–95; was admitted to the Union in 1802; and was the scene of engagements in the War of 1812, and of raids in the Civil War. Ohlau (ō'lou). A town in the province of Silesia, Prussia, situated on the Ohlau and Oder 17 miles southeast of Breslau. Population (1890), 8,632.

Ohlenschläger (ō'len-shlā-ger), Adam Gottlob. Born at Vesterbro, near Copenhagen, Nov. 14, 1779; died there, Jan. 20, 1850. A Danish poet and dramatist. His first important production was the poem "Guldhornene" ("The Golden Horns," 1803), the work from which the Scandinavian revival of recent Danish poetry in this year also he wrote and published a volume of poems ("Digte") which contains the lyrical drama "Sanct-Hansaftenspil" ("The Play of St. John's Eve"), which also appeared two new volumes of "Poetiske Skrifter" ("Poetical Writings"), which include, among other poems, "Thors Reise til Jotunheim" ("Thor's Journey to Jotunheim"), and "Aladdin eller den forunderlige Lampe" ("Aladdin, or the Wonderful Lamp"), considered one of the masterpieces of Scandinavian literature. With public assistance he was now enabled to undertake a journey abroad, and left Denmark this same year. In Halle he wrote his first tragedy, "Hakon Jarl" ("Earl Hakon"). He remained the winter in Berlin. In the spring of 1810 he went to Weimar, and lived there two or three months in intimate association with Goethe. He was subsequently in Dresden, and that winter went on to Paris, where during the next eighteen months he wrote the tragedies "Palnatoke" and "Axel og Valborg," and the poem "Baldur hin Gode" ("Baldur the Good"). In 1811, in Berlin, he wrote the tragedy "Correggio" in the German language. He returned to Denmark that same autumn, and in 1810 was made professor of esthetics at the Copenhagen University. After this period his productions were mainly lyric, dramatic, and prose, among them the dramatic idyl "Den lille Hyrdedreng" ("The Little Shepherd Boy," 1845). The epic parts of which had already been published "Nordens Guder" ("The Gods of the North"), which appeared complete in 1819; the tragedy "Erik og Abel" (1820); the epic "Hrolf Kraake" (1828); and his last great work, the epic "Regnar Lodbrok" (1848). His poetical works ("Poetiske Skrifter") were published at Copenhagen, 1839–63, in 32 vols. His autobiography, "Erindringer og Recollections"), was published at Copenhagen, 1850–51, in 4 vols.

Ohm (ōm), Georg Simon. Born at Erlangen, Bavaria, March 16, 1787; died at Munich, July 7, 1854. A German physicist, especially noted for his investigations in galvanism. He propounded an important law, known as "Ohm's law," which may be expressed as follows: the strength of electric current, or the quantity of electricity passing a section of the conductor in a unit of time, is directly proportional to the electromotive force, and inversely proportional to the sum of all the resistances in the circuit. He published "Die galvanische Kette mathematisch bearbeitet" (1827), etc.

Ohm, Martin. Born at Erlangen, Bavaria, May 6, 1792; died at Berlin, April 1, 1872. A German mathematician, brother of G. S. Ohm; professor at Berlin from 1824. His chief work is "Versuch eines vollkommen konsequenten Systems der Mathematik" (1829–52).

Ohnet (ō-nā'), Georges. Born at Paris, April 3, 1848. A French novelist and dramatist. After the Franco-German war he gave up the study of law for journalism. At first he was on the staff of the "Pays," but thereafter on that of the "Constitutionel." His fondness for dramatic composition led him to write "Regina Sarpi" (1875) and "Martha" (1877). Some of his novels have also been adapted to the stage: novels, plays, etc., "maitre de forges" and "La grande marniere" (1888). Ohnet's novels appeared as serials in the "Figaro," the "Illustration," and the "Revue des Deux Mondes" before being published in book form. The series, known collectively as "batailles de la vie," includes "Serge Panine" (1881), "Le maitre de forges" (1882), "La comtesse Sarah" (1883), "Lise Fleuron" (1884), "La grande marniere" (1885), "Les dames de Croix-Mort" (1886), "Noir et rose" (1887), "Volonté" (1888), "Le docteur Rameau" (1888), "Le dernier amour" (1890), "L'Ame de Pierre" (1890), "Petite de haine" (1891), "Nemrod et Cie" (1892), and "Le bonheur des amours" (1893). Georges Ohnet is an realistic rather than a naturalistic writer.

Ohod (ō-hōd'), or Ohud (ō-hōd'). Battle of. A victory gained at Ohod, near Medina, probably in 625, by the Koreish over Mohammed and his followers.

Ohrdruf (ōr'drōf). A manufacturing town in Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, Germany, situated on the Ohra 8 miles south of Gotha. Population (1890), 5,919.

Ohringen (ō'ring-en). A town in Würtemberg, on the Ohrn 33 miles northeast of Stuttgart. Population (1890), 3,194.

Oignon (wän-yōn'). A river in eastern France, chiefly in the department of Haute-Saône, which joins the Saône 21 miles east of Dijon. Various engagements were fought near its banks in Oct., 1870, and Jan., 1871. Length, 120 miles.

Oil City (oil sit'i). A city in Venango County, northwestern Pennsylvania, situated at the junction of Oil Creek and Allegheny River, 70 miles north by east of Pittsburg. It is noted as a center for the production and distribution of oil. Population (1890), 10,932.

Oil Islands. A group of small islands in the Indian Ocean. They are a dependency of Mauritius.

Oil Rivers Protectorate. A British protectorate in western Africa, on the coast between Lagos and Kamerun. It was organized in 1892, having been secured to Great Britain in 1884.

Oiron (wä-rōn'). A small town in the department of Deux-Sèvres, France, 22 miles south of Saumur. It has a remarkable old castle.

Oisans (wā-zon'). Alps of. A division of the Cottian Alps, known also as the Pelvoux group. The Pointe des Écrins rises to 13,460 feet.

Oise (wāz). A river in northern France which joins the Seine 15 miles northwest of Paris. Length, 187 miles; navigable from Chauny.

Oise. A department of France, formed from parts of the ancient Île-de-France and Picardy. Capital, Beauvais. It is bounded by Somme on the north, Aisne on the east, Seine-et-Marne and Seine-et-Oise on the south, and Eure and Seine-Inférieure on the west. Ojeda (ō-hā'thä), Alonso de. Born in Cuenca about 1468; died at Santo Domingo, 1514 or 1515. A Spanish cavalier, prominent in early American history. He went to Española with Columbus, 1493, and was engaged in many audacious enterprises there. Returning to Spain, he was associated with Cosa and Vespucci in the first exploration of the coasts of Guiana and Venezuela (May, 1499–June, 1500). In 1502 and 1505 he made other voyages to the northern coast of South America. Being empowered (1508) to settle and govern Nueva Andalucia (now northwestern Colombia), he fitted out an expedition at Santo Domingo, sailing Nov. 10, 1509. After various adventures he escaped he settled on the Gulf of Urabá or Darien. The colony was soon reduced to great misery, and Ojeda sailed away to seek aid. He was shipwrecked on Cuba, and finally reached Santo Domingo penniless and bankrupt. He died in complete poverty: but the Darien colony was eventually successful, and led to the discovery of the Pacific Ocean and Peru.

Ojibwa (ō-jib'wä), or Chippewa (chip'e-wä). [Pl., also Ojibways.] A large tribe of North American Indians. Their former range was along the north and south shores of Lakes Huron and Superior, and extended west across northern Minnesota to the Turtle Mountains of North Dakota. The Saulteurs and Pottawottomi were connected in a loose confederacy designated as the Three Fires. When supplied with firearms in the early part of the 18th century, they greatly extended their territory by occupying that of the Fox, Sioux, and Iroquois. They number now above 30,000, about equally divided between the United States and Canada. Their name seems to refer to "puckering" or "drawing up," whether, as variously contended, of the lips in speaking or drinking, of a peculiar seam in the moccasin, or of the skin of a roasted prisoner's in uncertain. The French called them Saulteurs (people of the falls"), from the band first met at Sault ste Marie. See Algonquian.

Oldenburg (ōl'den-bėrg; G. pron. ōl'den-bōrg). 1. A grand duchy of northern Germany, and state of the German Empire. Capital, Oldenburg. It comprises the duchy proper of Oldenburg and the principalities of Birkenfeld and Lübeck. The duchy of Oldenburg is bounded by the North Sea on the north, Hannover and Bremen on the east, and Hannover on the south and west. Its surface is generally flat. The chief occupation is agriculture; it is noted for its live stock. The government of Oldenburg is a hereditary constitutional monarchy, under a grand duke and a Landtag of one chamber; it sends 1 member to the Bundesrath and 2 members to the Reichstag. The prevailing religion is Protestant. Oldenburg was ruled by counts as early as the 11th century; passed under the rule of Denmark in 1667; was ceded to the Holstein-Gottorp line in 1773; was raised to a duchy in 1777; gained and lost territory by the changes of 1803; joined the Confederation of the Rhine in 1808; was annexed to France in 1810; was restored to self-government in 1813; entered the Germanic Confederation in 1815; gained additions of territory in 1817 and 1818; assumed the rank of a grand duchy in 1829; sided with Prussia in 1866; and joined the North German Confederation in 1866. Oldfield (old'fēld), Anne. Born at London, 1683; died Oct. 23, 1730. A celebrated English actress. Rich took her into his company at fifteen shillings a week in 1700. In 1706 she was assigned to her the part of Lady Betty Modish in his "Careless Husband," and she won immediate success. Thereafter she held to be the rival of Mrs. Bracegirdle. She was the original representative of 65 characters, the greater part of which belong to genteel comedy. She played tragic parts with great dignity and feeling, both in Lady Betty Modish, Lady Townley, Sylvia, and Mrs. Sullen she was probably never equaled. Mrs. Oldfield in private life was not without reproach. She lived for some years with the Honorable Mordaunt, a wealthy bachelor, handsome and accomplished, by whom she had a son who bore his father's name and surname. Later, and after the death of Mr. Mordaunt, she was "under the protection" of General Churchill, the son of an elder brother of the Duke of Marlborough, by whom she had also one son, who married Lady Mary Walpole, a natural daughter of Sir Robert, for whom he received the rank of an earl's daughter. When Mrs. Oldfield died her remains lay in state in the Jerusalem Chamber of Westminster Abbey, and there she was buried at the west end of the south aisle.

Old Mortality. A historical novel by Sir Walter Scott, published in 1816. The scene is laid in Scotland during the rising of the Covenanters in 1679. It is so called from the epithet given to Robert Paterson, who passed his life in restoring the gravestones of the Covenanters.

Old Nick. A name of the devil.

Our popular name for the evil one, Old Nick, is a word of this class. The nickers held a conspicuous place in German romance and story – they are frequently spoken of in the Anglo-Saxon poem of Beowulf. They were waterfairies, and dwelt in the lakes and rivers as well as in the sea. So late as the fifteenth century, a MS. dictionary in English and Latin explains nickerby "sirena." At present, in our islands, the word is only preserved in the name of the devil, Old Nick. T. Wright, Essays, I. 255.

Ollanta (ōl-yän'tä). The hero of a celebrated Quichua (Peruvian) drama, the "Apu-Ollanta." He is represented as living early in the 15th century. He loves Cusi Coyllur, daughter of the Inca Pachacutec Yupanqui; but after she has borne him a child the Inca immures her in a dungeon, and Ollanta leads a rebellion for 10 years. He is finally captured, but is pardoned by the new Inca who has come into power, and his wife and child are restored to him. The drama is of great beauty. It was first reduced to writing in the 17th century, but there is little doubt of its antiquity, and the hero is perhaps historical. Several Spanish plays and a recent opera have been founded on it. Also written Ollantai or Olantay.

Ollantay-tambo (ōl-yän'tī-täm'bō). [Quichua, 'house of Ollanta.'] A ruined Inca fort and town of the department of Cuzco, Peru, in the valley of the Urubamba, 41 miles northeast of Cuzco. The place was a frontier post of the Incas, and is connected with many events in their history, as well as with the legend of Ollanta (which see). The buildings are in a remarkably perfect condition, and some of them rest on older foundations, supposed to be pre-Incarial. There is a small modern village on the site. Also written Ollantoc tanqu.

Olympia (ō-lim'pi-ä). [Gr. Ὀλυμπία.] In ancient geography, a valley in Elis, Peloponnesus, Greece, situated on the Alpheus in lat. 37° 38′ N., long. 21° 38′ E. It is famous as the seat of a celebrated sanctuary of Zeus and of the Olympic games, the most important of which, the great public games of classical antiquity. (See Olympic games.) The origins of the sanctuary and of the games are anterior to history: according to tradition they were established in the 9th century B. C. The Olympic oracle, in the 9th century B. C. The list of Olympian victors goes back to 776 B. C., which is the first year of the first Olympiad: but the Olympiads did not come into common use in chronology until much later. The sanctuary was situated in the valley between the rivers Cladeus and Alpheus, at the foot of the hill of Cronus. A temporary enclosure, called the Altis, 800 feet long by 600 feet, surrounded the temple of Zeus, the Heræum, the Metroum, the treasuries of the various Greek cities and states, and other buildings, besides numberless statues and other works of art, and steles with commemorative inscriptions. Outside of the Altis lay the Bouleuterion or senate-house, the Stadium, which was the chief scene of the athletic contests, and a number of large gymnasia, dating mostly the last chiefly of Roman date. The Olympic games were abolished by Theodosius in 394 A. D. The monuments were much shattered by earthquakes in the 6th century, and at time went on were progressively buried by landslips from Cronus and inundations of the Cladeus and Alpheus, in one of which the Hippodrome was entirely swept away. Sand and earth were deposited to a depth of from 10 to 20 feet over the ruins. In 1829 the French Expedition de Morée made some superficial excavations, and recovered some sculptures (now in the Louvre) from the Zeus temple. In six seasons of work after 1874, the German government laid bare down to the ancient level the greater part of what survives of the sanctuary. The sculptural finds were richer than had been hoped for, though they include two capital pieces—the Hermes of Praxiteles and the Nike of Paeonius. In the departments of architecture and epigraphy, however, the German excavations take rank as the most important that have been made. The antiquities discovered were preserved on the site, the new museum for the purpose. The temple of Zeus, dating from the early part of the 5th century B. C., is a Doric peripteros of 6 by 13 columns, measuring 90 by 210 feet; the columns were 7 feet in base-diameter and 34 high. The cella had pronaos and opisthodomos with 2 columns in antis and 2 interior ranges of 7 columns. In the cella stood the famous chryselephantine statue of Zeus, seated, about 40 feet high, by Phidias. The pediments were filled with important groups of sculpture, much of which has been recovered. That of the eastern pediment represents the chariot-race of Pelops and Œnomaus, under the presidency of Zeus; that of the western the fight between Lapiths and Centaurs in presence of Apollo. The end walls of the cella bore a Doric frieze with very fine sculptured metopes representing the exploits of Hercules. The Heræum or temple of Hera, a temple of very ancient foundation, showing peculiarities of construction in wood and unburned brick partly replaced piecemeal in stone with the advance of time, is a large Doric peripteros of 6 by 16 columns: the cella had pronaos and opisthodomos in antis, and was divided in the interior into 3 aisles by 2 ranges of columns. The famous Hermes of Praxiteles was found in this temple. The Philippeum, a circular building built by Philip of Macedon about 336 B. C. The cella was surrounded by a peristyle of 18 Ionic columns, and had in the interior a range of Corinthian columns, and chryselephantine statues of Philip and his family.

Olympia. The capital of the State of Washington and of Thurston County, situated at the southern extremity of Puget Sound, about lat. 47° 4′ N., long. 122° 35′ W. Population (1890), 4,698.

Olympias (ō-lim'pi-as). [Gr. Ὀλυμπιάς.] Put to death 316 B. C. The wife of Philip II. of Macedon, and mother of Alexander the Great. She was involved in the wars of Alexander's successors, and was allied with Polysperchon against Cassander about 317 B. C.

Olympic games, The. The greatest of the four Panhellenic festivals of the ancient Greeks. They were celebrated at intervals of four years in honor of Zeus, in a sacred inclosure called the Altis, in the plain of Olympia (which see), containing many temples and religious, civic, and gymnastic structures, besides countless votive works of art. The festival began with sacrifices followed by contests and racing, wrestling, etc., and closed on the fifth day with processions, sacrifices, and banquets to the victors. The victors were crowned with garlands of wild olive, and on their return home they were received with extraordinary distinction, and enjoyed numerous honors and privileges. The period of four years intervening between one celebration and the next, called an Olympiad, is notable as the measure by which the Greeks computed time—776 B. C. being the reputed first year of the first Olympiad.

Olympieum (ō-lim-pi-ē'um), or Temple of Olympian Zeus. A temple founded at Athens by Pisistratus, but not completed in the form represented by the existing remains until the reign of Hadrian. The temple was Corinthian, dipteral, with 8 columns on each front and 20 on each flank, and measured 135 by 350 feet. Fifteen huge columns, 56 feet high, are still standing, and of these a single, the finest temple stood in a large peribolos which was adorned with statues.

Olympiodorus. A Greek historian. He was a native of Thebes in Egypt, lived in the first half of the 5th century, and wrote 22 books of general history dealing with the period from 407 to 425, abstracts of which have been preserved in the "Bibliotheca" of Photius.

Olympus (ō-lim'pus). [Gr. Ὄλυμπος.] In ancient geography, the name of various mountains, especially of one on the borders of Macedonia and Thessaly, regarded as the especial home of the gods (hence often used for heaven). Height, about 9,750 feet. The Mysian Olympus was on the borders of Mysia, Bithynia, and Phrygia in Asia Minor. Others were in Lydia, Lycia, Cyprus, Laconia, and Elis. Tozer enumerating 14 in all.

Olynthiac (ō-lin'thi-ak) Orations. A series of three orations delivered at Athens by Demosthenes 349–348 B. C., for the purpose of inducing the Athenians to assist Olynthus against Philip II. of Macedon.

Olynthus (ō-lin'thus). [Gr. Ὄλυνθος.] In ancient geography, a city in Chalcidice, Macedonia, situated near the head of the Toronaic Gulf, in lat. 40° 16′ N., long. 23° 21′ E. It was the capital of an important confederacy, and its suppression by Sparta in the war of 383–379 B. C. It was attacked by Philip II. of Macedon and was captured and destroyed by him 348 or 347 B. C. The Olynthian orations of Demosthenes were appeals to Athens to support Olynthus against Philip.

Om (om, but originally and more correctly ōm). [According to Böhtlingk and Roth, an obscuration of Skt. ava, the result of prolonging and nasalizing a, an assertive particle corresponding to Bloomfield (A. O. S. xiv. cl.), identical with Gr. ἀν, L. quæ-nam, Goth. and-i, and meaning 'now then,' 'well now.'] A particle that plays a great role in Hindu religious literature. Its original sense is that of solemn affirmation. Popular etymology, perhaps existing as early as the Upanishads, derives it from the root av, 'to protect,' and in accordance with which the teacher began and the pupil ended a lesson of the Veda. Much of the Upanishads is one of the mystic meaning of Om, as summing up in itself all truth. In later Hinduism it is regarded as consisting of the three elements a, u, and m, symbolizing respectively Vishnu, Shiva, and Brahma, so that the pranava ('murmur') Om signifies the Hindu triad. (See Bloomfield as quoted above.) Om is also the first syllable of the "hundred of six syllables" Om vani padme hum, so conspicuous in Buddhism and especially in Lamaism. Its reputed author is the deified saint Avalokiteshvara (which see), or Padmapani, 'the lotus-handed,' as he is called by Tibetans. It is variously translated. Bloomfield gives "Om, O jewel on the lotus, hum"; Goldstücker, "Salvation (Om) [is] in the jewel-lotus (mani-padme), amen (hum)," where the compound "jewel-lotus" refers to the saint and the flower from which he rose, according to which the formula was originally an invocation to Avalokiteshvara.

Om (ōm). A river in western Siberia which joins the Irtish at Omsk.

Omagh (ō'mä or ō-mäch'). The capital of the county of Tyrone, Ireland, 27 miles south of Londonderry.

Omaguas (o-ma'gwās): called Cambevas (kām-bā'vās) by Brazilians. An Indian tribe of northern Peru, on the north side of the upper Marañon, between long. 72° and 75° W. (territory claimed but not held by Ecuador). They were formerly very numerous, having many large villages connected by good roads. They were agriculturists, dressed in cotton garments, used gold ornaments, and are said to have been sun-worshipers; probably they had derived the germs of civilization from the Incas. Their heads were artificially flattened. The Omaguas were gathered into mission villages in the 17th century. Their numbers rapidly decreased, mainly by disease, and the remnants are mixed by intermarriage with other tribes. They belong to the Tupi linguistic stock.

Omaguas, Kingdom or Province of. A name given in the 16th century to the region occupied by the Omaguas. About 1545 reports were brought to New Granada and Peru of a vast and rich city in this district. It was connected with the tales of El Dorado, and became the object of several expeditions. See Urana, Pedro de.

Omaha (ō'ma-hā). [Pl., also Omahas. From Umonhon, those who went up stream or against the current.] A tribe of the Dhegiha division of North American Indians, numbering 1,197. They are in eastern Nebraska. See Dhegiha.

Omaha (ō'ma-hā). The capital of Douglas County, Nebraska, situated on the Missouri in lat. 41° 16′ N., long. 95° 56′ W. It is the largest city in the State, an important railway center, and the eastern terminus of the Union Pacific Railroad; has flourishing commercial and manufactures, and contains important oil-refining works. It has very large stock-yards, and pork-packing and beef-packing are important industries. It was founded in 1854, and was formerly the capital of the State. Population (1890), 140,452.

Oman (ō-mān'). A sultanate in eastern Arabia, bordering on the Persian Gulf and Gulf of Oman. Capital, Muscat. The surface is largely mountainous. It is one of the most flourishing independent states of Arabia. In the beginning of the 19th century it was much more extended, but the name is now limited to the region near Muscat. It is under British supervision. Area, 82,000 square miles. Population, 1,500,000.

Oman, Gulf of. An arm of the Arabian Sea, south of Persia and east of Arabia. It is connected with the Persian Gulf by the Strait of Ormuz.

Omar (ō'mär), ibn al-Khattab. The second calif. He succeeded Abu-Beke in 634, and was assassinated by Firoza Persian slave, in 644. His daughter Hafsah was the third wife of Mohammed. During his reign Syria, Phenicia, Persia, Egypt, and Jerusalem were brought under the sway of Islam. He took an important part in the first conquests of the Koran. He was the first to assume the title "Commander of the Faithful" (Emirul-mûminin), and he "organized a complete military-religious commonwealth" (Sedillot).

Omar II. Calif 717–720, successor of Solyman.

Omar, Mosque of, or Kubbet es-Sakhra ('Dome of the Rock'). A celebrated mosque on the platform of the temple in Jerusalem. It is an octagon of 66 feet to a side, with 4 porches and a range of pointed windows, pierced with beautifully executed Persian tiles. The interior has two concentric ranges of columns and piers, the central range supporting the drum of the dome, which is 97 feet high and 65 in diameter. Beneath the dome is the sacred rock, upon which it is held that Abraham was about to sacrifice Isaac. The walls and the drum are covered with beautiful Byzantine mosaics of different dates, and the windows are filled with splendid 16th-century colored glass. The mosque was originally a very early Byzantine church, but it has been much modified by the Mohammedans.

Omar Khayyam (ō'mär khī-yām'). A Persian poet and astronomer who was born at Nishapur in Khorasan in the latter half of the 11th and died within the first quarter of the 12th century A. D. He studied under the imam Mowaffak of Nishapur, having as his companions Hasan ben Sabbah, afterward the head of the military order of the Assassins, and Nizamul-Mulk, later vazir of Alp Arslan and Malik Shah, respectively son and grandson of Toghrul Beg, the founder of the Seljukian dynasty. Having attained power, Nizam-ul-Mulk granted Omar Khayyam a yearly pension. Omar was one of the eight learned men appointed by Malik Shah to reform the calendar, the result being the Jalali era, so called from Jalalud'din, one of the king's names: "a computation of time which," says Gibbon, "surpasses the Julian and approaches the accuracy of the Gregorian style." He was the author of a mathematical work entitled "Zijj Malikshahi," and of an Arabic treatise on algebra, but is especially known as a poet from his Rubaiyat, or Quatrains (in 2 verses or 4 hemistichs of which the first, second, and fourth rime), which have been translated by Fitzgerald and by Whinfield.

Omer Pasha (ō'mėr pash'ā) (originally Lattas). Born Nov. 24, 1806; died at Constantinople, April 18, 1871. A Turkish general. He commanded an army in the Crimean war, and commanded against the insurgents in Crete in 1867.

Ommiads (ō-mī'adz), or Omayyads (ō-mī'yadz). A dynasty of califs which reigned in the East 661–750 A. D., the first of whom was Moawiyah, the descendant of Omayya (the founder of a noted Arab family), and successor to Ali. The Ommiads were followed by the Abbassides. The last of these Eastern Ommiads escaped to Spain and founded the caliphate of Western Africa. This Victorious Hadsche, and with it the Ommiad dynasty, became extinct in 1031.

After the first four (or "orthodox") Khalifs, Abu-Beke, Omar, Othman, and Aly, who were elected more or less by popular vote, the Syrian party set up Moawia as Khalif at Damascus, and from him sprang the family of Omayyad Khalifs, so called from their ancestor Omayya. There were fourteen Omeyyad Khalifs, who reigned from 661 to 750, when they were deposed by Es-Seffah, the Victorious, who was the first of the second dynasty of Khalifs, called Abbaside, after their ancestor Abbas, an uncle of the Prophet Mohammed. The Abbaside Khalifs transferred the seat of government from Damascus to Baghdad, and lifted the Khalifate until its destruction by the Mongols in 1258. Among the members of the deposed family of the Omeyyads was Abd-er-Rahman, a name which means "Servant of the Merciful God." Poole, Story of the Moors, p. 59.

Omnibus Bill, The. A series of compromise measures passed through Congress 1850, largely through the influence of Clay. The chief provisions were the admission of California to the Union, organization of the Territories of Utah and New Mexico, the repeal of the slave-trade in the District of Columbia, and a fugitive-slave law.

Oña (ōn'yä), Pedro de. Born at Los Confines, on the Biobio River, Chile, about 1565; died at Lima, Peru, after 1632. A Spanish-American poet. Most of his life was passed in Peru, where he was fiscal of the audience. His principal work is the epic "Arauco domado" (1st ed. Lima, 1596), which is in some respects a continuation of Ercilla's "Araucana." It has some poetical merit, and is of much historical value.

Onas. See Fuegians.

Onatas (ō-nā'tąs). [Gr. Ὀνάτας.] Flourished about 500–460 B. C. An Æginetan sculptor and painter, a contemporary of Ageladas the teacher of Phidias. Encyclopædia. He was especially famous for his statues of athletes, and was much admired and highly praised by Pausanias, who describes many of his works. As the Ægina marbles were probably made in his day, it may well be that they are either his work or represent his characteristics.

Oñate (ōn-yā'tā). A town in the province of Guipuzcoa, northern Spain, 38 miles west of Pamplona. Population (1887), 6,152.

Oñate (ōn-yā'tā), Juan de. Born at Guadalajara, Mexico, about 1550; died after 1611. A settler and first governor of New Mexico. He was a son of the founder of Guadalajara, and was married to a granddaughter of Hernando Cortés. In 1595 his proposition to settle New Mexico was accepted by the viceroy Velasco, and after much delay the grant was confirmed by the Count of Monterey. Oñate left Zacatecas in Jan., 1598, with 130 men besides Indians, a large wagon- and cattle-train, etc.; reached the Rio Grande, probably at El Paso, April 20; took formal possession April 30; crossed the river; and in Aug. founded the first capital, San Juan (Santa Fé was founded later). At the first river he had little trouble with the Indians. Early in 1599 he explored a part of Arizona, and in 1604 followed the Gila River down to the Gulf of California. He probably ceased to rule as governor in 1608.

Onca (on'kä). A Phenician goddess, the deity of wisdom, compared by the Greeks to Athene.

Ondegardo (on-dā-gär'dō), Polo de. Born at Salamanca about 1500; died, probably at Potosí, Upper Peru, about 1575. A Spanish lawyer and antiquarian. He went to Peru in 1545; was a trusted councilor of several rulers; and was corregidor of Potosí and Lima. He made a special study of Inca laws and customs, with the object of ingrafting the best of them on the Spanish legislation. His two "Relaciones" or reports (1561 and 1571) are still in manuscript, but have been freely used by historians: a smaller report was edited by Markham for the Hakluyt Society 1873. In 1559 Ondegardo discovered at Cuzco several mummies of the Inca sovereigns.

Onega (on'e-gä). A small seaport near Archangel, Russia, situated at the entrance of the river Onega into the White Sea.

Onega, Lake. The second largest lake in Europe, situated in the government of Olonetz, northwestern Russia, northeast of Lake Ladoga. It is connected by canals with the Volga and Dwina systems. Its waters pass by the Swir into Lake Ladoga, and thence into the Neva. Length, 152 miles. Greatest width, about 50 miles. Area, 3,763 square miles.

Oneglia (ō-nel'yä). A seaport in the province of Porto Maurizio, Italy, situated on the Mediterranean 57 miles southwest of Genoa. It has a trade in olive-oil. Population (1881), 7,433.

Oneida (ō-nī'dä). [Pl., also Oneidas. The name is translated 'standing stone' or 'people of the stone.'] A tribe of North American Indians. The early French writers called them Oneiout. They formerly occupied the lands east of Oneida Lake, New York, and the upper waters of the Susquehanna, west to the southward. They were not prominent in the Iroquois Confederacy, and sometimes acted adversely to its other members, as they were in intervals friendly with the French and took part with the colonies in the Revolution. In 1833 most of them removed to and still remain at Green Bay, Wisconsin, but others are in Ontario. Altogether they number (1894) over 3,000. See Iroquois.

Oneida Community. A religious society or brotherhood, the Bible Communists or Perfectionists, established in 1847 on Oneida Creek, in Lenox township, Madison County, New York, by John H. Noyes, after unsuccessful attempts to establish it at New Haven, Connecticut, in 1834, and at Putney, Vermont, in 1837. A branch of the Oneida Community also existed at Wallingford, Connecticut, but has now been withdrawn. Originally the Oneida Community was strictly communistic, all property and all children belonging primarily to the society, and the restrictions of marriage being entirely abolished; but in 1879, owing to the increasing demand of public opinion that the social practices of the society should be abandoned, marriage and family life were introduced, and in 1880 communism of property gave place to a joint-stock system, and the community was legally incorporated as "The Oneida Community, Limited."

Oneida Lake. A lake in central New York, 11 miles northeast of Syracuse. Its outlet is by the Oneida and Oswego rivers into Lake Ontario. Length, 20 miles.

O'Neil (ō-nēl'), Hugh, Earl of Tyrone. Died 1616. An Irish chieftain. He assumed the title of The O'Neil, and in 1597 headed an insurrection against the English, whom he defeated at Blackwater in 1598. He negotiated a truce with the Earl of Essex in 1599, and was defeated by Mountjoy 1601. He submitted about 1603.

O'Neill, Eliza. Born in Ireland, 1790; died there, Oct. 29, 1872. A noted Irish tragic actress, the successor of Mrs. Siddons. She made her first appearance in Drogheda as the Duke of York in "Richard III." in 1803, in a small strolling company of which her father was manager. She first appeared at Covent Garden in 1814. She made a large fortune in Ireland and England, and was married in 1819 to Mr. (afterward Sir) William Becher. Her best parts were Juliet, Belvidera, Mrs. Haller, and Mrs. Beverley.

Onosander (on-ō-san'dėr). [Gr. Ὀνόσανδρος.] A Greek writer on military tactics.

Of the tacticians subsequent to Polybius, the most noted was Onosander, who flourished in the middle of the 1st century of our era, and dedicated to Q. Veranius Nepos, consul in A. D. 49, a brief but comprehensive treatise on the military art, which has come down to us, with the title Στρατηγικὸς Λόγος. It is divided into 42 chapters, and gives instructions with regard to all the details of a campaign. It is written in Attic Greek, and in a sufficiently pure style. The author, who was also known as a commentator on Plato, was the source of the military writings of the Emperors Mauritius and Leo, and in a French translation was used as a manual of the military art by Maurice of Saxony. Müller, Hist. of the Lit. of Anc. Greece, (III. 280. (Donaldson.)

Onotes (ō-nō'tēs). An extinct tribe of Indians who inhabited the eastern shore of Lake Maracaibo. They were fishermen, and built their houses on piles in the water. Ojeda, who found them in 1499, was reminded by their dwellings of Venice (whence he named the country Venezuela). Probably the Onotes were soon carried off into slavery: but huts similar to theirs are still made in the same region.

Onslow (onz'lō), George. Born at Clermont-Ferrand, France, July 27, 1784: died there, Oct., 1853. A French composer of instrumental music.

Ontario (on-tā'ri-ō), formerly called Upper Canada. A province of the Dominion of Canada. Capital, Toronto. It is bounded by Quebec on the northeast and east (separated by the Ottawa River) and on the south and west by the United States, from which it is in the main separated by the St. Lawrence, Lake Ontario, Niagara River, Lake Erie, Detroit River, Lake and River St. Clair, Lake Huron, St. Mary's River, and Lake Superior: Keewatin and Manitoba bound it on the northwest. Area, 101,733 square miles; diversified surface; belongs to the St. Lawrence basin; produces cereals, apples and other fruits, etc.; has manufactures of lumber, machinery, cotton and woolen goods, etc.; and has rich mineral resources. The government is vested in a lieutenant-governor, executive council, and legislative assembly. It sends 24 members to the Dominion Senate, 92 to the House of Commons. Its inhabitants are chiefly of English, Irish, Scottish, German, and French descent. Ontario was explored by the French in the 17th century. It was ceded to Great Britain in 1763, and largely settled by Tories in the American Revolutionary period. It was separated from Quebec and called Upper Canada in 1791. It was the scene of the battles of the Thames, Lundy's Lane, etc., in the War of 1812. A political rebellion occurred in 1837. It was reunited to Quebec in 1841, and was again separated and became the province of Ontario in the new Dominion in 1867. Area, 219,650 square miles. Population (1891), 2,114,321.

Ontario, Lake. The smallest and easternmost of the five great lakes, lying between the province of Ontario on the north and New York State on the south. It is connected with Lake Erie by the Niagara River, and for navigation by the Welland Canal. Its outlet is the St. Lawrence River. Kingston, Toronto, Hamilton, Oswego, and Sackett's Harbor are on its banks. Length, 190 miles; breadth, 55 miles. Area, 7,240 square miles. Elevation, 246 feet.

Ophir (ō'fėr). In Old Testament geography, a country whence gold, silver, precious stones, ivory, sandalwood, apes, and peacocks were brought. It was especially noted for its gold. The fleet of Solomon occupied 3 years in making the journey. It has been variously identified with India, Sumatra, the coast of Malabar, the east coast of Africa, and the southern or southeastern portion of Arabia on the Persian Gulf. The last identification has in its favor the statement in Gen. x. 29, where Ophir is mentioned as the son of Joktan.

Ophir (ō'fėr), Mount. 1. A volcano in Sumatra, near the western coast, about lat. 0°, long. 99° E. Height, about 10,000 feet. —2. A mountain east of Malacca, Malay Peninsula. Height, about 3,800 feet.

Ophites (of'its). A Gnostic body, of very early origin, especially prominent in the 2d century, and existing as late as the 6th century. Its members were so called because they held that the serpent (Gr. ὄφις) in Eden should be venerated as the impersonation of divine wisdom, the great teacher and civilizer of the human race. Also called Naassenes.

Ophiuchus (of-i-u'kus). [Gr. ὄφις, a serpent, and ἔχειν, to hold.] An ancient northern constellation, representing a man holding in each hand a serpent. See Serpent-bearer. Also called Serpentarius. The Serpent is now treated as a separate constellation.

Opie (ō'pi), Mrs. (Amelia Alderson). Born at Norwich, England, Nov. 12, 1769: died there, Dec. 2, 1853. An English novelist, daughter of Dr. Alderson of Norwich, and wife of John Opie the painter. She published various novels, the first, "Father and Daughter," appearing in 1801. She became a Quaker. After this appeared her "Illustrations in Lying." "Detraction Displayed" etc.

Opie, John. Born at St. Agnes, near Truro, May, 1761; died April 9, 1807. An English painter. In 1780 he was brought into notice by Johnson and Dr. Wolcot (Peter Pindar), who announced him as "the Cornish wonder." In 1786 he exhibited his first historical picture, the Assassination of James I., and in 1787 the "Murder of Rizzio." His lectures at the Royal Academy were published in 1809.

Opimius (ō-pim'i-us), Lucius. Roman consul 121 B. C. He was put forward by the senate to oppose the reforms of Caius Gracchus, and was the leader of the optimates who killed Gracchus with 3,000 of his followers in 121. He was after ward exiled for accepting bribes from Jugurtha.

Opitz (ō'pits), Martin. Born at Bunzlau, Silesia, Dec. 23, 1597: died at Dantzic, Aug. 20, 1639. A German poet and writer. He attended the gymnasia of Bunzlau, Breslau, and Beuthen where he wrote in Latin his first work, "Aristarchus," in praise of the German language and a poetical medium. In 1618 he went to the university at Frankfort-on-the-Oder to study jurisprudence, whence the following year he removed to Heidelberg. In 1620 at the outbreak of the Thirty Years' War, he went to Holland. At Leyden he became acquainted with the philologist Heinsius, whom he followed to Jutland, where he wrote the poems, published 15 years later, "Teodgendium in Wolgemuthetden dem Krieg" and "Poems of Consolation in the Adversities of War." In 1622 he was called to a position in the gymnasium at Weissenburg. During the years of his residence in Transylvania, where he went into the service of the Protestant duke of Liegnitz. In 1624 appeared his "Buch von der deutschen Poeterey" ("Book of the German Art of Poetry"), which became the principal authority on versification and style. In 1626 he went into the service of the Catholic Count Dohna at Breslau. In 1628 he was crowned poet laureate by Emperor Ferdinand II. After the death of Count Dohna, in 1633, he went back to the Duke of Liegnitz, was subsequently with the Swedes, and ultimately was made secretary and historiographer to King Ladislaus IV. of Poland, at Dantzic, where he died of the plague. He was the founder of the first Silesian school of poets, so called. He wrote secular, religious, and didactic-descriptive poems: to the last class belong "Zlatna" and "Vesuvius." Some of his hymns are to be found in the church hymn-books. His "Herzynia" is a prose idyl in which verses are occasionally introduced. Among other translations he issued a version of the text of the Italian opera "Daphne," which was produced at Torgau in 1627, and was, accordingly, the first German opera. By his advocacy of the Alexandrine verse and the precepts of his "Art of Poetry" he brought about a reform of German versification, in that the poets of the preceding centuries had simply counted the number of syllables, without reference to the quality of those upon which the metrical accent fell.

Opium War. A war between Great Britain and China, due to the attempt of the Chinese government to prevent the importation of opium. It began in 1840, and was ended by the treaty of Nanking (which see) in 1842.

Oporto (ō-por'tō; Pg. pron. ō-por'tō). A district in the province of Entre Douro e Minho, Portugal. Area, 1,696 sq. miles.

Oporto, Pg. o Porto ("the Port"). A seaport, chief city of Portugal, province Entre Douro e Minho, Portugal, situated on the Douro, near its mouth, in lat. 41° 9' N., long. 8° 37' W. Next to Lisbon it is the chief city of the country. It is noted for its manufacturing place. It has a cathedral, etc., and has been famous since 1678 as the place of export of port wine. The cathedral is early Pointed, but modernized. The cloister, of 1485 but earlier in character, survives, with well-carved, almost Romanesque capitals. The Maria Pia, or railroad bridge across the Douro, is a magnificent iron structure of 525 feet span and 200 feet height, the largest. The bridge of Dom Luis I., of similar construction, finished in 1886, has a span of 566 feet and a height of 200. The town was taken by the Anglo-Portuguese army under the Duke of Wellington in 1809; was the scene of the beginning of the revolution of 1820; was defended against Dom Miguel 1832–33; and has been the scene of insurrection, particularly in 1846–47 and 1891. Population (1878), 105,863.

Oposura (ō-pō-sō'rä). [Opata, 'heart of the iron-wood.'] The capital of the district of Moctezuma, also called by that name in the province of Sonora, Mexico. It contains about 2,000 inhabitants, and lies on the bank of the Oposura River. It has suffered a great deal from the depredations of the Apaches during the 19th century.

O. P. Riots. The "old-price riots," which took place at Covent Garden Theatre, London, in 1809. The cost of the new theater then just built was so great that the proprietors raised the price of admission, and the public resolved to resist.

The house opened on the 18th of September, 1809, with "Macbeth" and the "Quaker." The audience was dense and furious. They sat with their backs to the stage, or stood on the seats, they hissed, they hissed and hoot the Kemble family especially; not a word of the performance was heard, for when the audience were not denouncing the troubles, they were disturbing it by singing the first few of their then fresh voices. The upper gallery was seconds that soldiers, of whom 500 were in the house, rushed in to capture the rioters, who let them get aboard to the lower gallery, where they were hospitably received. The sight of the soldiers increased the general exasperation. The excitement continued for weeks, and many of the rioters were arrested.] The acquittal of leading rioters gave a little spirit to some after displays; but it led to a settlement. Audiences continued the affray, flung posts on the stage to bring down the dancers, and pelted out their own O. P. dance before leaving; but, at a banquet to celebrate the triumph of the cause in the acquittal of the leaders, Mr. Kemble himself appeared. Terms were there agreed upon; and on the sixty-seventh night a banner in the house, with "We are satisfied" inscribed on it, proclaimed that all was over. After such a fray the satisfaction was dearly bought. The 4s. rate of admission to the pit was diminished by 6d., but the half-price remained at 2s. The private boxes were decreased in number, but the new price of admission to the boxes was maintained. Thus, the managers, after all, had more of the victory than the people; but it was bought dearly.

Doran, English Stage, II. 362–366.

Ops (ops). In Roman mythology, a goddess of plenty, wife of Saturn.

Optic (op'tik). Oliver. The pseudonym of William Taylor Adams.

Oran (ō-ran'; F. o-roṅ'). 1. The westernmost department of Algeria, bordering on Morocco on the west. Area, 44,616 square miles. Population (1891), 342,066. —2. The capital of the department of Oran, a seaport situated on the Mediterranean in lat. 35° 44′ N., long. 0° 42′ W. It has important trade. The old Spanish town exists along with the modern town. It was a flourishing mediæval town; was held by the Spaniards from 1509 to 1708, and from 1732 until after the earthquake of 1790, and was taken by the French in 1831. Population (1891), 73,839.

Orange (or'ānj; F. pron. ō-roṅzh'). A town in the department of Vaucluse, France, 13 miles north of Avignon: the ancient Arausio, noted for its Roman antiquities. The Roman triumphal arch here, well preserved and of fine masonry, is attributed to the reign of Marcus Aurelius. It has a large central arch between two smaller ones flanked by Corinthian columns, the two middle ones of which support a pediment. It is ornamented with reliefs among which naval trophies are conspicuous; and the deep vault of the central opening is beautifully coffered. The height is 72 feet, width 67, and thickness 26. The Roman theater is much ruined in its scarce, but possesses probably the finest surviving example of an ancient stage structure. The splendid uncemented wall at the back is 340 feet long, 120 high, and 13 thick, and still shows the pierced corbels which extended the awnings. The stage has 3 doors, and was roofed. The theater could seat about 7,000. The Cimbri defeated the Romans here in 105 B. C. It was a flourishing Roman town. Later it was the capital of a principality which fell to the house of Nassau in 1531; was under the Nassau-Orange family until 1702; and was annexed to France in 1714. The title of Prince of Orange was retained in the house of Nassau. Population (1891), 9,850.

Orange Free State, or Orange River Free State. A republic in southern Africa. Capital, Bloemfontein. It is bounded by the South African Republic (separated by the Vaal) on the north, Natal on the east, Basutoland on the southeast, Cape Colony (separated by the Orange River) on the south, and Griqualand West on the west. The surface is undulating and hilly. The chief occupation is the raising of live stock; the leading products are wool, diamonds, and fish-feathers, and hides. The government is vested in a president and a legislative assembly called the Volksraad. The inhabitants are natives (129,787 in 1890), and whites of European (especially Dutch) descent. The territory was settled in the first half of the 19th century by emigrants from Cape Colony; was annexed by Great Britain in 1848; and became independent in 1854. Area, 48,326 square miles. Population (1890), 207,586.

Orangemen (or'ānj-men). 1. Irish Protestants. The name was given about the middle of the 17th century by Roman Catholics to the Protestants of Ireland, on account of their support of the cause of William III. of England, prince of Orange.

2. A secret politico-religious society, instituted in Ireland in 1795. It was organized for the purpose of upholding the Protestant religion and ascendancy, and of opposing Romanism and the Roman Catholic influence in the government of the country. Orangemen are especially prominent in Ulster, Ireland, but local branches called lodges are found all over the British empire, as well as in many parts of the United States.

Orange River, or Kai Gariep (kī gā-rēp'). The chief river in southern Africa. It rises in Basutoland near the border of Natal, and flows generally westward, separating Cape Colony from the Orange Free State, British Bechuanaland, and German Southwest Africa. Its chief tributary is the Vaal. Length, about 1,000 miles. It is "not much better than a huge torrent."

Oranienbaum (ō-ra'nē-en-boum'). [G., 'orange-tree.'] A town in the province of St. Petersburg, situated on the Gulf of Finland 25 miles west of St. Petersburg. It is noted for its imperial palace. Population, 3,350.

Orarian (ō-ra'ri-an). See Eskimauan.

Orators, The. A play by Samuel Foote, performed in 1762. It satirizes a Dublin printer named George Faulkner.

W. Cooke, Memoirs of Foote, I. 197.

Oratory of St. Philip Neri. A Roman Catholic religious order, founded at Florence by Filippo Neri in 1575: so named from a chapel he built for it and called an oratory. It is composed of simple priests under no vows. Its chief seat is Italy, but congregations were founded in England in 1847 and 1849 under the leadership of former members of the Anglican Church.

Orbe (orb or or'be). A town in the canton of Vaud, Switzerland, situated on the Orbe 15 miles northwest of Lausanne. It was the ancient capital of Little Burgundy. Population (1888), 3,855.

Orbe. A small river in the department of Jura, France, and canton of Vaud, Switzerland, flowing into the Lake of Neuchâtel. It is the upper course of the Thièle (or Zihl).

Orbegoso (ōr-bā-gō'sō), Luis José. Born near Huamachuco, Aug. 25, 1795: died at Truxillo, 1847. A Peruvian general and politician. He was elected president by the constitutional assembly, Dec. 37; included in the amnesty, January, 1840, of those banished by Gamarra; and in June, 1835, he accepted the intervention of Santa Cruz, president of Bolivia. Santa Cruz established the Peru-Bolivian Confederation in 1836, and Orbegoso was nominated president of North Peru, with the rank of grand marshal. In Aug., 1837, he was defeated by Gamarra and the Chilenos, and went into exile for some years. Also written Orbegoso.

Orbetello (or-bā-tel'lō). A small town in the province of Grosseto, Italy, situated near the Mediterranean. 75 miles northwest of Rome.

Orbigny (or-bēn-yē'), Alcide Dessalines d'. Born at Coueron, Loire-Inférieure, Sept. 6, 1802; died near St. Denis, June 30, 1857. A French naturalist. From 1826 to 1833 he traveled in southern Brazil, the Plaine States, Bolivia, and Peru. The results of his journey were published at government expense as "Voyage dans l'Amerique Meridionale" (9 vols. 1834–47, including Antarctic, 3 vols.; "L'Homme Americain," chronological, 2 vols.; and the remainder on zoology, etc.). Among his other writings are "Paleontologie française" (8 vols. 1840–54; unfinished), and several works on Foraminifera. He contributed to Ramon de la Sagra's "History of Cuba" the volumes on birds, Mollusca, and Foraminifera.

Orbigny, Charles Dessalines d'. Born at Coueron, Loire-Inférieure, France, Dec. 2, 1806; died Feb. 15, 1876. A French geologist, brother of A. D. d'Orbigny.

Orc (ôrk), The. 1. A deformed giant who eats men but not women, in Boiardo's and Ariosto's "Orlando." He has two projecting bones for eyes. Mariana's Orc is a monster.

2. A sea-monster in Ariosto's "Orlando Furioso," killed by Orlando when about to devour Olympia.

Orcades (ôr'ka-dēz). The ancient name of the Orkney Islands.

Orcagna (or-kän'yä) (properly di Cione), Andrea, or Arcagnolo (of which name Orcagna is a corruption). Born at Florence about 1329; died about 1368. A Florentine painter, sculptor, and architect. He studied the gold-smith's craft under his father, and painted with his brother Bernardo. In the practice of this art he appears to have been chiefly occupied during the early part of his life. After painting with his brother the life of the Madonna, and the two great frescos of Heaven and Hell in Santa Maria Novella, the frescos of the Campo Santo, and the facade of San Apollinare, he painted the picture of the Coronation of the Virgin (now in the National Gallery). By these works he gained so great a reputation that he was commissioned to paint the frescos of the Triumph of Death and the Last Judgment in the Campo Santo at Pisa. Orcagna's peculiar powers here obtained full expression. Associated with Taddeo Gaddi he framed the old granary of Arnolfo del Cambio into the Church of Or San Michele.

Orchard of Ireland. A name given to County Armagh, Ireland.

Orchardson (ôr'chärd-son), William Quiller. Born at Edinburgh, 1835. A British figure-painter. He removed to London in 1863. He has painted "The Challenge" (1865), "Casus Belli" (1870), "The Bill of Sale" (1876), "On Board H. M. S. Bellerophon July 23, 1815" (1880), "Napoleon on the Deathy bequest), "The Salon of Madame Recamier" (1888), etc.

Orchha. See Tehri.

Orchies (or-shē'). A town in the department of Nord, France, 12 miles southeast of Lille. Population (1891), commune, 3,918.

Orchomenus (or-kom'e-nus). [Gr. Ὀρχομενός.] In ancient geography, the name of several cities in Greece. (a) A city in Bœotia, situated on the Cephissus and on Lake Copais, 55 miles northwest of Athens. It was the capital of the ancient Minyæ. Here in 85 B. C., Sulla defeated Archelaus, the general of Mithridates, king of Pontus. The site contains important remains of antiquity. The treasury of Minyas, so called, is a very ancient tomb of the Mycenæan beehive type. The plan is circular, 45 feet in diameter, covered in by a pseudo-dome formed by corbeling in the stones of the wall. A side chamber, rectangular, had its sides and ceiling incrusted with slabs carved with beautiful arabesques. The "treasury" is approached by a dromos or passage 16 feet wide. (b) A city in Arcadia, 35 miles west-southwest of Corinth. It was one of the leading Arcadian cities.

Orcus (ôr'kus). A Latin name for Hades.

Ord (ôrd). Edward Otho Cresap. Born in Maryland, Oct., 1818: died at Havana, July 22, 1883. An American general. He graduated at West Point in 1839, served against the Seminole Indians 1839–42, and was appointed brigadier-general of United States volunteers at the beginning of the Civil War. He gained the victory of Dranesville in Dec., 1861, and served before Richmond and Petersburg in 1864–65. He retired with the brevet rank of major-general in 1880.

Ordaz (ōr-däth'), or Ordás (ōr-däs'), Diego de. Born about 1480: died at sea, 1533. A Spanish captain. It appears that he was with Ojeda at Darien, 1509–10; subsequently he served with Velasquez in Cuba, and with Cortés in the conquest of Mexico, 1519–21. Having obtained a grant of the country now embraced in Guiana and eastern Venezuela, he explored the Orinoco to the mouth of the Meta, 1531–32. Martinez, one of his officers, afterward asserted that he had seen on the expedition the golden city of Manoa, thus probably starting the myth of El Dorado. Ordaz, on his return to the coast, was arrested on false charges, and sent to Santo Domingo: he was freed by the audience, and died while on his way to Spain.

Ordericus Vitalis (ōr-de-ri'kus vi-tā'lis), or Orderic (ōr'de-rik). Born at Atcham, near Shrewsbury, England, 1075: died about 1143. An English historian and Benedictine monk. He wrote an "Ecclesiastical History," especially relating to Normandy and England in the 11th and 12th centuries (ed. by Le Prévost 1838–55).

Orders. Institutions, partly imitated from the mediæval and crusading orders of military monks, but generally founded by a sovereign, a national legislature, or a prince of high rank, for the purpose of rewarding meritorious service by the conferring of a dignity: a number of the more prominent of these orders are described below. Most honorary orders consist of several classes, known as knights companions, officers, commanders, grand officers, and grand commanders, otherwise called grand cross or grand cordon. Many orders have fewer classes, a few having only one. It is customary to divide honorary orders into three ranks: (a) Those which admit only nobles of the highest rank, and among foreigners only sovereign princes or members of reigning families. Of this character are the Garter (England and Spain), the Elephant (Denmark), and the Garter (Great Britain); it is usual to regard these three as the existing orders of highest dignity. (b) Those orders which are conferred upon members of noble families only, and sometimes because of the mere fact of noble birth, without special services. (c) Orders in which merit, which is supposed to be conferred for services only: of these the Legion of Honor is the best-known type. The various orders have their appropriate insignia, consisting usually of a collar of gold, suspended to the collar, or from the breast, a star, jewel, badge, ribbon, or the like. It is common to speak of an order by its name alone, as the Garter, the Bath.—Guelfic Order, a Hanoverian order of knighthood, founded in 1815 by George IV. (then prince regent), and entitled the Royal Hanoverian Guelfic Order. It includes grand crosses, commanders, and knights, both civil and military.—Military Order of Savoy, an order founded by King Victor Emmanuel I. of Sardinia in 1815, adopted by the kingdom of Italy, and still in existence. The badge is a cross of gold in red enamel, voided, and surmounted by a royal crown. The ribbon is blue.—Order for Merit, a Prussian order composed of two classes, military and civil. The latter was founded by Frederick the Great in 1740 (compare Order of Generosity). The badge is a blue enameled cross adorned with the letter F. the words "pour le mérite," and other insignia. Since 1810 it has been given exclusively for distinction on the field. The second class (or second order) was founded by Frederick William IV. in 1842 for distinction in science and art.—Order of Alcantara, a Spanish military order said to be a revival of a very ancient order of St. Julian, and to have received its name from the city of Alcantara, part of the Moorish A. of Castile in 1218 by the Knights of Calatrava, and transferred by the latter.—Order of Alexander Nevski, a Russian order founded in 1725 by Peter the Great, the first conferred by the empress Catharine I. in 1725. The ordinary badge is a cross patté, the center being a circle of white enamel showing St. Alexander on horseback, the arms of the cross being in a double-headed eagle between every two arms, and the whole surmounted by an imperial crown. This is worn hanging to a broad red ribbon.—Military Order of Calatrava, a Spanish military order founded in the middle of the 12th century, and taking its name from the fortress of Calatrava, which had been captured from the Moors in 1147, and was now confided to the new order. It is still in existence. The badge is a cross fleury enameled red, attached to a red ribbon.—Order of Charles III., a Spanish order founded by Charles III. in 1771.—Order of Charles XIII., a Swedish order founded by the sovereign of that name in 1811, for Freemasons of the higher degrees.—Order of Christ, a Portuguese order founded by King Dionysius and confirmed about 1318. It contains three degrees, of which the highest is limited to six persons. The present badge is a cross of eight points enclosed by an oak wreath, and having between the arms four ovals in black enamel, each bearing five golden billets, symbolical of the five wounds of Christ. The ribbon is red.—Order of Civil Merit, the name of several orders, the most prominent of which is that of Prussia. See Order for Merit.—Order of Fidelity, (a) An order of the duchy of Baden, founded by Charles Frederick the Great in 1715. It is still in existence, and consists of two classes only, that of grand cross and that of commander. The badge is a cross of eight points in red enamel, having between each two arms the cipher CC; the same cipher occupies the middle of the cross, with the motto "Fidelitas." The ribbon is orange-colored and edged with blue. (b) An order of Portugal, founded by John VI. in 1823 for the supporters of the monarchy during the insurrectionary movements in that country.—Order of Generosity, a Prussian order of distinction founded in 1665, but not organized till 1685, and superseded in 1740 by the Order for Merit.—Order of Glory (Nishan Iftikar), an order of the Ottoman empire, instituted by Mahmoud II. in 1831.—Order of Isabella the Catholic, known as the Royal American Order, and instituted in 1815 to reward loyalty among the American colonists and dependents of Spain. The order still exists. The badge is a cross patté indented, the center filled with a medallion, the arms enameled red, and with gold rays between the arms.—Order of Jesus, of Jesus Christ, etc., the name of several orders of more or less religious character. in Spain, Sweden, etc.—Order of Leopold, an Austrian order founded by Francis I., emperor of Austria, in memory of the emperor Leopold II. It dates from 1808, and is still in existence.—Order of Louisa, a Prussian order founded by Frederick William III. in 1814, for women only.—Order of Maria Louisa, a Spanish order for women, founded in 1792, and still in existence.—Order of Maria Theresa, an Austrian order founded by the empress of that name in 1757, but modified by the emperor Joseph II. in 1765.—Order of Maximilian, an order for the encouragement of art and science, founded in 1853 by Maximilian II. of Bavaria.—Order of Medjidi. See Medjidi.—Order of Military Merit. (a) An order instituted in 1759 by Louis XV., of France, for Protestant officers, as the Order of St. Louis was limited to Catholics. Its organization was similar to that of the latter order. In 1814 it was reorganized for officers of the army and navy. It has not been conferred since 1830. The badge is somewhat similar to that of St. Louis, and the ribbon is of the same color. (b) An order founded by Duke Charles Eugene of Wurtemberg in 1759.—Order of Oddfellows, The Independent. See Odd-Fellows.—Order of Our Lady of Montesa, a Spanish order founded in the 14th century by the Infante Don Jayme of Aragon, afterward attached to the crown of Spain.—Order of Our Lady of Mount Carmel, an order founded by Henry IV. of France on the occasion of his embracing Catholicism, and in a measure replacing the Order of St. Lazarus.—Order of St. Andrew, a Russian order founded by Peter the Great in 1698. The badge is the double eagle of Russia in black enamel, upon the breast of which is the crucifix of St. Andrew, with saltier-shaped cross, the whole surmounted by an Imperial crown. The ribbon is blue; but the insignia of pensions like badge is worn from a collar composed of similar crowned eagles, of ovals bearing saltiers, and of shields with flags and crowns.—Order of St. Andrew in Scotland. See Thistle, Order of the.—Order of St. Benedict of Aviz, a Portuguese order said to date from the 12th century. The badge is a cross fleury of green enamel, having a gold fleur-de-lis on the ends between every two rays of the cross, and hangs from a green ribbon worn around the neck.—Order of St. Gall. Same as Order of the Bear.—Order of St. George, (a) A Bavarian order founded on, as its name implies, and by the elector Charles Albert in 1729. It is still in existence, and is divided into three classes. (b) A Russian order founded in 1769 by the empress Catharine II. This is conferred upon a commanding general who has defeated an army of fifty thousand men, or captured the enemy's capital, or brought about an important victory. There is but one person living who has gained this distinction regularly, though it has been given to a foreign sovereign.—Order of St. James of the Sword (also called St. James of Compostella, and Knights of Santiago), antiquity, asserted to have been approved by the Pope in 1175, and still existing. In the middle ages this order had great military power, and administered justice in Leon. The badge is a sword of red enamel, affecting the form of a sword, and bearing a scallop shell at the junction of the arms. The ribbon is red.—Order of St. Januarius, founded in 1738 by Charles of the Holy Land, and was afterward transplanted into France, where it retained independent existence until, under Henry IV., it was in a measure replaced by the Order of our Lady of Mount Carmel. It disappeared during the Revolution.—Order of St. Louis, a French order founded by Louis XIV. in 1693 for military service, and continued by Louis XV. in 1759. After the creation of the Bourbons in 1814 this order was reinstated. No knights have been created since 1830. The badge is a cross of eight points, having in the center of the obverse a figure of Louis XIV., armed and crowned, and holding in his hands swords of honor; there is a gold fleur-de-lis between every two arms. The ribbon is flame-colored.—Order of St. Michael, a French order instituted by Louis XI. in 1465, and modified by Henry III. and Louis XIV. Since 1830 it has not been conferred. The badge is a cross of eight points with a fleur-de-lis between the arms, and in the central medallion a figure of the archangel Michael trampling on the dragon. The ribbon is black.—Order of St. Michael and St. George, British order of knighthood, 1818, originally for natives of the Ionian and Maltese islands and for other British subjects in the Mediterranean. It has since been greatly extended.—Order of St. Patrick, an Irish order of knighthood instituted by George III. of England in 1783. It consists of the sovereign, the lord lieutenant of Ireland, and twenty-two knights.—Order of SS. Maurice and Lazarus, a Piedmontese order in Piedmontese in the middle ages, especially charged with the care of pilgrims.—Order of St. Stanislaus, a Polish order dating from 1765, and adopted by the czars of Russia.—Order of the Annunciation. (a) The highest order of knighthood (Ordine supremo dell' Annunziata) of the ducal house of Savoy, now the royal house of Italy, dating under its present name from 1362, when it superseded the Order of the Collar, said to have been founded by Count Amadeus VI. of Savoy in 1362, but probably older. The medal of the order bears a representation of the annunciation; its collar is decorated with alternate golden knots and enameled roses, the latter bearing the letters F E R T, making the Latin word fert (The bears), an ancient motto of the house of Savoy, but variously otherwise interpreted. The king is the grand master of the order. (b) An order of nuns, founded about 1594 at Bourges, France, by Queen Joanne of Valois after her divorce from Louis XII. (c) An order of nuns, founded about 1604 at Genoa, Italy, by Maria Victoria Fornari.—Order of the Bath, an order said to have been instituted at the coronation of Henry IV. of England in 1399. It received this name from the fact that the candidates for the honor were put into a bath the preceding night to denote a superstitious or absolution from all former stain, and that they were now to begin a new life. The present Order of the Bath, however, was instituted by George I. in 1725, as a military order, consisting, exclusive of the sovereign, of a grand master and thirty-six companions. In 1815 the order was greatly extended, and in 1847 it was opened to civilians. It is now composed of three classes: viz., military and civil knights grand crosses, G. C. B.; knights commanders, K. C. B.; and knights companions, C. B. The badge is a golden Maltese cross of eight points, with the lion of England in the four principal angles, and having in a circle in the center the rose, thistle, and shamrock (representing respectively England, Scotland, and Ireland) between three imperial crowns; motto, "Tria juncta in uno." Stars are also worn by the first two classes. That of the knights grand cross is oval silver, with eight points of rays wavy, on which is a gold cross bearing three crowns, encircled by a ribbon displaying the motto of the order, while beneath the scroll is inscribed Ich dien ("I serve"), the motto of the Prince of Wales. The star of the knights commanders differs chiefly in lacking the wavy rays.—Order of the Bear, an order of knights instituted by the emperor Frederick II., and having its center at the abbey of St. Gall, in Switzerland. It ceased to exist when St. Gall became independent of the house of Austria.—Order of the Black Eagle, a Prussian order founded by Frederick I. in 1701. The number of knights is limited to 30, exclusive of the princes of the blood royal, and all must be of unquestioned nobility. The badge is a cross of eight points, having in the center a circle with the monogram F R (for Fredericus Rex), the four arms are enameled red, with the eagle of Prussia in black enamel between each two arms; the ribbon is orange, but on certain occasions many the badge is worn pendent to a collar consisting alternately of black eagles holding thunderbolts and medallions bearing the monogram as the badge and inscribed with the motto "Suum cuique."—Order of the Burgundian Cross, an order founded by the emperor Charles V., which did not survive.—Order of the Chrysanthemum, an order founded by the Mikado of Japan in 1876.—Order of the Conception, an order founded in the 17th century by some of the nobles of the Holy Roman Empire, and confined to persons of German birth.—Order of the Cordon Jaune, a French order for Protestant and Roman Catholic knights, founded in the 16th century by the Duke of Nevers for the protection of the poor of Poland. It is now a secret society.—Order of the Crescent, a Turkish order instituted in 1799, and awarded only for distinguished bravery in the naval or military service. The badge is a star of five points. The order of Crescent was founded by Charles of Anjou in Sicily in 1268, but had a short existence. René of Anjou, count of Provence and titular king of Naples and Sicily, founded another Order of the Crescent in the latter part of the 15th century.—Order of the Crown, the title of several honorary orders founded by sovereigns in the 19th century, each in memory of some event in the history of the family to which it belongs. (a) The Order of the Crown of Bavaria, founded by King Maximilian Joseph I. in 1808. It is granted to persons who have distinguished themselves in the service of the state. (b) The Imperial Order of the Crown of India, founded in 1878 for women, at the time of the assumption by Queen Victoria of the title Empress of India. It ranks immediately after the Victorian order of the highest rank. (c) The Order of the Crown of Italy, founded by King Victor Emmanuel in 1868. (d) The Order of the Crown of Prussia, founded by King William I. in the year 1861. (e) The Order of the Crown of Rumania, founded by King Charles on assuming the royal title in 1881. (f) The Order of the Crown of Würtemberg, founded by King William I. in 1818.—Order of the Danebrog, the second in importance of the Danish orders of knighthood, originally instituted in 1219, but in 1671 reorganized, with new statutes in 1693 and 1808, and several times modified since. It now consists of four classes, besides a fifth class wearing the silver cross of merit.—Order of the Elephant, founded as a knightly order in 1464 by Christian I., and now extinct.—Order of the Fish, a decoration founded by the Mogul emperors in India, and conferred upon certain English statesmen in the early part of the 19th century. The insignia of the nature of standards borne before the person upon whom the order is conferred.—Order of the Garter, the highest order of knighthood in England, founded in 1344 by Edward III., and consisting of the sovereign, the Prince of Wales, and 24 knights companions, and open, in addition, to such English princes and foreign sovereigns as may be chosen, and to such of William Brooke's companions as by special reasons, so that the whole order usually numbers about 50. Formerly the knights companions were elected by the body itself, but since the reign of George III. the appointment has usually been the sovereign's. The order, at first (and still sometimes) called the Order of St. George, was instituted by Edward III. some time between 1344 and 1348, and underwent changes in its early history of all its original records. Its purpose has been supposed to have been at first only temporary. According to a legend, the order, probably the Garter, King Edward III. picked up a garter dropped by the Countess of Salisbury at a ball, and placed it on his own knee with the words to whoever should feel disposed to make light of the incident, his countess in response to the notice taken of the garter, "Honor qui mal y pense" (Evil be to him who thinks evil of it.) To this incident the foundation, the name, and the motto of the order are usually ascribed. The insignia of the order are the garter, the badge, and the collar of gold. George adding the diamond, probably in the time of George I., which bears the figure, representing a cold garter; the lesser George, worn on a broad blue ribbon over the left shoulder; and the star of spangles, of silver, worn on the left breast. The garter is worn on the left leg by the gents. The vesture consists of a mantle of blue velvet lined with white taffeta, a hood and surcoat of crimson velvet, and a hat of black velvet with a plume of white ostrich feathers having in the center a tuft of black heron-feathers. The sovereign, when a woman, wears the ribbon on the left arm.—Order of the Golden Fleece, an order founded by Philip the Good, duke of Burgundy, in 1430, on the occasion of his marriage with the infanta Isabella of Portugal. The office of grand master passed to the house of Hapsburg in 1477 with the dismemberment of the Burgundian dominions, which included the Netherlands. After the time of the emperor Charles V. (he d. 1558) this office was exercised by the Spanish kings; but after the cession of the Spanish Netherlands to Austria, the latter power in 1715 again claimed the office. The dispute remains undecided, and the order therefore exists independently in Austria and in Spain. The badge of the order is a golden ram pendent by a ring which passes round its middle. This hangs from a jewel of elaborate design, with enameling of several colors, various suggestive devices, and the motto "Pretium laborum non vile."—Order of the Griffin, an order of the grand duchy of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, founded in 1884.—Order of the Holy Ghost, an order established by Henry III. of France in 1578, in commemoration of his election to the throne of Poland on the day of Pentecost. It was the grand order of the house of Bourbon, and was abolished at the end of the 18th century, and united to the order of St. Lazarus by Pope Clement XIII. (a) Neapolitan order, same as Order of the Knot.—Order of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem. See Hospitalers.—Order of the Illuminati, a celebrated secret society founded by Professor Adam Weishaupt of Ingolstadt in Bavaria in 1776, originally called the Society of the Perfectibilists. It was theistic and republican in principle; aimed at general enlightenment and emancipation from superstition and tyranny; had an elaborate system of grades, and became closely associated with freemasonry; and spread widely through Europe, though the Illuminati were never very numerous. The order existed much longer, and was suppressed in Bavaria in 1785, but lingered for some time elsewhere.—Order of the Indian Empire, an order instituted in 1878 for British subjects in India, and conferred on the occasion by Queen Victoria of the title of Empress of India, and open to natives as well as to persons of European extraction.—Order of the Iron Cross, a Prussian order founded in 1813 for military service, and the name revived after Napoleon. In 1870 the order was reorganized. It consisted of the great cross conferred only on a few princes and generals, and two classes comprising a total of a thousand knights. The original badge was a cross patté of black iron with a silver rim, upon which were the initials F. W. (Frederick William) and the date 1813. The present badge is only a modification of this. The ribbon is black with white border.—Order of the Iron Crown, an order founded by Napoleon I. as King of Italy, and adopted by Francis I. of Austria after the fall of Napoleon. It consists of three classes. The badge is the double eagle of Austria resting upon a ring (which represents the Iron Crown of Monza), and surmounted by an imperial crown; this is attached to an orange ribbon edged with blue.—Order of the Knights of Malta. Same as Order of the Hospitalers of St. John of Jerusalem.—Order of the Knot, Neapolitan order of short duration, founded at Naples in the 14th century.—Order of the Legion of Honor, in France an order of merit founded by Napoleon I. in 1802, and for services, instituted in May, 1802, during the consulate, by Napoleon Bonaparte, but since modified from time to time in important particulars. Under the first empire the decoration conferred invested the person decorated with the rank of legionary, officer, commander, grand officer, or grand cross. The order holds considerable property, the proceeds of which are paid out in pensions principally to wounded and disabled members.—Order of the Lion, the name of several orders in Germany, etc.; especially, an order founded in 1815 by William I., first king of the Netherlands, and continued by the later kings. It is an order for civil merit. The badge is a star of eight points, having in the central medallion a rampant lion, and in addition a golden fleur-de-lis between each two arms.—Order of the Mystics. Same as Order of SS. Cosmo and Damian.—Order of the Palm, a German society founded at Weimar in 1617 to the preservation and culture of the German language. It disappeared in 1690. Also called Fruit Bringing Society.—Order of the Red Eagle (formerly Order of the Red Eagle of Baireuth), also called Order of Brandenburg, an order founded by the margrave of Bayreuth in 1705, and in 1792 adopted by Frederick William II. of Prussia on succeeding to the principality. The present insignia of the order are the same as those of the original foundation. The badge is an eight-pointed cross having in the center a medallion with a red eagle bearing the arms of the Hohenollern family. The arms of the cross are of white enamel, with an eagle of red enamel between each two arms. The ribbon is striped orange-color and white.—Order of the Saint Esprit. See Order of the Holy Ghost.—Order of the Star of India (in the full style, The Most Exalted Order of the Star of India), an order for the British possessions in India, founded in 1861. The motto is, "Heaven's light our guide." The ribbon is light blue with white stripes near the edge.—Order of the Thistle (in full, The Most Ancient and Most Noble Order of the Thistle), a very old Scottish order which has been renewed and modified, and is still in existence. The devices of the order are St. Andrew's cross, or saltier, and a thistle-flower with leaves; these enter into the different badges. The collar of the order is composed of thistles alternating with sprigs of rue, the latter being the emblem of the order of the Elephant. Its badge is suspended to a collar of white cords connected by gilded links.—Order of the White Elephant, a Siamese order founded in honor of great antiquity. Its foundation, however, is specifically ascribed to Chitchai (1702) and its reorganization to Issara (1868). It is limited to 200 knights companions, members of the royal family, and no person can be knight who is not previously a member of the Order of the Danebrog. The collar of the order is composed alternately of elephants and enameled roses. The badge is an elephant bearing on his back a tower, and on it is head a driver dressed like a Hindu. The ribbon on which the badge is suspended is of orange color.—Order of the White Falcon, an order founded by the Duke of Saxe-Weimar in 1732, and renewed in 1815. It is still in existence, and consists of three classes, numbering exclusive of the family of the reigning grand duke, 12 grand crosses, 25 commanders, and 50 knights. The badge is an eight-pointed cross in green enamel, having between each two arms a pomel in gold enamel, and bearing upon the whole, in relief, a falcon in white enamel. On the reverse are the words "L'Ordre de la vigilance," and a trophy of arms, emblems which differs for the civil and the military knight: also the motto "Vigilando ascendimus." The ribbon is dark pale-green moiré. Also called Order of Vigilance.—Order of the Yel- low String. See Order of the Cordon Jaune.—Order of Vigilance. Same as Order of the White Falcon.—Teutonic Order, a military order founded at Acre in Palestine in 1190 and continued by the emperor and the Pope. Its chief objects were at first the care of the sick and wounded pilgrims and the defense of the Holy Land, and it soon rivaled the Templars and the Hospitalers.

Orders in Council. Orders promulgated by the British sovereign with the advice of the privy council. Specifically, the orders of Nov., 1807, which prohibited neutral trade directly with France or the allies of France. All goods to be landed in England, pay duties there, and be reexported under English regulations. These orders bore with especial severity on American commerce.

Ordinance of Nullification. See Nullification.

Ordinance of 1784. An act of the United States under the Confederation, passed April 23, 1784, for the temporary government of the Northwest Territory, which comprised tracts ceded to the United States by the several States.

Ordinance of 1787. An act of Congress, passed in 1787, which secured to the Northwest Territory freedom from slavery, religious freedom, education, etc., and provided for its future subdivision.

Ordinances, F. Ordonnances (or-do-nońs'). Various legislative acts in French history. The most celebrated were the Ordinances of July, promulgated by Charles X. in July, 1830. They took away the freedom of the press and made other arbitrary changes, and were the cause of the revolution of July and the overthrow of the Bourbon monarchy.

Ordinary (or'di-na-ri). The. A comedy by Cartwright, produced about 1643, printed in 1651: an imitation of the "Alchemist."

> The worst of the crew, after the exposure of their villainies, resolve to take refuge in the congenial soil of New England, where no good works are allowed and faith alone is demanded. Lounsbury, Chaucer, III. 117.

Ore (or'a). Luis Geronimo de. Born at Guamanga, Peru, about 1545; died at Concepcion, Chile, 1628. A Franciscan prelate and author. He was professor of theology at Cuzco, commissary of his order in Peru, and bishop of Nicaragua from 1606. His works include "Descripcion del Nuevo Orbe" (Lima, 1578), "Relacion de los mártires de Florida" (Madrid, 1605), a life of S. Francisco Solano, and devotional books in the Indian languages of Peru.

Örebro (ö're-brö). 1. A lan of southern Sweden. Area, 3,521 square miles. Population (1891), 183,394.—2. The capital of the lan of Örebro, situated on the Svarta, near Lake Hjelmar, 98 miles west of Stockholm. It has been the seat of various diets: that of 1540 declared the monarchy hereditary, and that of 1810 elected Bernadotte crown prince. Two treaties were negotiated here in 1812 – one between England and Sweden, and the other between England and Russia. Population (1891), 14,074.

Oregon (or'e-gon). [Named from the Oregon River, now the Columbia. The name Oregon, supposed to be of Indian origin, occurs in Carver's "Travels" (1763) as the name of a "river of the West which falls into the Pacific Ocean at the Straits of Anian."] 1. One of the Western States of the United States of America, extending from lat. 42° to 46° 15′ N., and from long. 116° 40′ to 124° 32′ W. Capital, Salem; chief city, Portland. It is bounded by Washington (partly separated by the Columbia) on the north, Idaho (partly separated by the Snake River) on the east, Nevada and California on the south, and the Pacific Ocean on the west. It is traversed by the Coast Range, Cascade Mountains, and Blue Mountains; chief peaks in the State are Mounts Hood and Jefferson. It belongs largely to the valley of the Columbia and its chief tributary the Willamette: there is an inland basin in the southeast. The chief agricultural products are wheat and other cereals; the leading exports are wheat, flour, salmon, wool, and fruit. It has 34 counties, sends 2 senators and 2 representatives to Congress, and has 4 electoral votes. The mouth of the Columbia was discovered by the American captain Gray in 1792. It was partly explored by Lewis and Clark 1805–06. A trading-post was founded at Astoria in 1811. The territory between lat. 42° and 54° 40′ N. was long in dispute between Great Britain and the United States: the claims were settled by treaty in 1846. Oregon Territory was organized in 1848, and it was admitted to the Union in 1859. Area, 96,030 square miles. Population (1890), 313,767.

O'Reilly (o-ri'li), Alexander. Born at Dublin, 1725; died at Chiloaña, Murcia, Spain, March 23, 1794. An Irish soldier. He served successively in the Spanish, Austrian, and French armies; reentered the Spanish army 1761; commanded the forces which put down a revolt of the French in Louisiana (then lately ceded to Spain) 1769; and in 1774–75 commanded an unsuccessful expedition against the Algerians. He was created Count O'Reilly, but in 1786 was disgraced and deprived of all commands.

O'Reilly, Andrew. Born in Ireland in 1740; died at Vienna in 1832. An Irish soldier. He served in the Austrian army under Maria Theresa and Joseph II.; fought at Austerlitz; and surrendered Vienna May 12, 1809.

O'Reilly, John Boyle. Born at Dowth Castle, County Meath, Ireland, June 28, 1844; died at Hull, Mass., Aug. 10, 1890. An Irish-American journalist and poet. He was the son of William David O'Reilly, master of the Nettleville Institute at Dowth Castle. In 1863 he enlisted in the Tenth Hussars in Ireland for the purpose of spreading revolutionary sentiments among the soldiers. He was sentenced to death on the charge of high treason in 1866. The sentence was commuted to 20 years' penal servitude, and he was sent out to the penal colony in Australia, where he arrived in 1868. He escaped to the United States in 1869, and in 1870 secured employment on the Boston "Pilot," of which he became editor in chief in 1874. He published "Songs from the Southern Seas" (1874), "Songs, Legends, and Ballads" (1878), "The Statues in the Block" (1881), etc.

Orejones (ō-rä-hō'näs). [Sp., 'eared' or 'large-eared.'] A name given by the Spanish in America to various Indians who distended the lobes of the ears by means of metal or wooden disks. It included: (a) The Incas of the dead royal in Peru, who were distinguished by the common people by the weight of their gold or silver eardisks. (b) A tribe of Upper Paraguay, described by early authors, but about whom little that is definite is known. (c) Indians on the northern branches of the Upper Amazon, in Brazil, Colombia, and Ecuador, called Orelhudos by the Brazilians. There are apparently several hordes, perhaps of different stocks. Those on the Javary and Içá are described as degraded but inoffensive savages who distend the ear-lobes with wooden disks until they touch the shoulders. (d) An extinct tribe of northern Columbia, Mexico.

Orel (ō-rel'). 1. A government of central Russia. It is surrounded by the governments of Smolensk, Kaluga, Tula, Tambov, Voronezh, Kursk, and Tchernigov. The surface is undulating. It is an important agricultural government. Area, 18,042 square miles. Population (1893), 2,140,130.

2. The capital of the government of Orel, situated at the junction of the Orlik with the Oka, about lat. 52° 57′ N., long. 36° 7′ E. It is an important commercial and manufacturing center, and a leading market for grain. Population (1890), 79,135.

Orelhudos. See Orejones.

Orélie Antoine (ō-ra-lē' on-twän') I. (de Tounens). A French adventurer who was proclaimed king of Araucania in 1861. He was arrested on Araucanian territory by the Chilean government in 1862. The arrest being pronounced illegal, he was declared to be free, but was committed to go to France, where he published "Orélie-Antoine Ier, roi d'Araucanie et Patagonie, et sa captivité en Chili" (1863). Having in the meantime returned to Araucania, he was deposed during a second absence in France by a certain Planchut, whom he had left in Araucania as his deputy.

O'Rell, Max. See Max O'Rell.

Orellana (o-rā-lya'nä), Francisco de. Born at Truxillo about 1490: died, probably in Venezuela, about 1546. A Spanish soldier, first explorer of the Amazon. He was intimate with the Pizarros in his youth; went to Peru about 1535; and settled Guayaquil in 1537. In 1540–41 he served with Gonzalo Pizarro's expedition (see Pizarro, Gonzalo, 2nd art.). Having been sent ahead with a brigantine and 50 soldiers to seek for provisions (probably in April 1541), he passed down the river of the Amazons, and, unable or unwilling to return, continued on down the latter river. In the course of this voyage the Indians told him of a tribe of female warriors, of whom he claimed to have encountered them near the mouth of the Trombetas: from this story the river derived its present name. Orellana reached the mouth of the Amazon late in 1541, and returned to Spain, where he received a patent and a grant to conquer the country discovered by him, and made an unsuccessful expedition to it in 1544.

Orellana, River of. [From its discoverer, Francisco de Orellana.] A name frequently given to the early books and maps, to the Amazon River. It is still occasionally used.

Orelli (o-rel'li), Johann Kaspar. Born at Zurich, Switzerland, Feb. 13, 1787: died Jan. 6, 1849. A Swiss classical philologist, noted for his editions of Horace, Cicero, and Tacitus.

Ore (ōr) Mountains. See Erzgebirge.

Orenburg (o'ren-bōrg). 1. A government in southeastern Russia, bordering on Asia. It is bounded by Siberia, the governments of Perm, Ufa, and Samara, Uralsk, and Turgai. The surface is partly mountainous (a continuation of the Ural Mountains), partly steppe. Area, 73,316 square miles. Population (1890), 1,572,300.

2. The capital of the government of Orenburg, situated on the Ural about lat. 51° 46′ N., long. 55° 10′ E. It is an important trading center. Population (1891), 62,534.

Orense (o-ren'sä). 1. A province in Galicia, Spain. It is bounded by Portugal on the south, and on the other sides by the provinces Pontevedra, Lugo, Leon, and Zamora. The surface is mountainous. Area, 2,723 square miles. Population (1887), 405,074.

2. The capital of the province of Orense, situated on the Minho in lat. 42° 18′ N., long. 7° 50′ W. The cathedral is of the 13th century, but retains many Romanesque features, as the very long transepts. The bridge over the Minho, built in 1230, has seven arches, four of them pointed, and rises in a steep grade from both ends to the middle. The grand central arch has a span of about 150 feet, and its crown is 135 feet above the river bed. Population (1887), 14,163.

Oresteia (o-res-tē'yä). A trilogy by Æschylus, founded on the history of the family of Agamemnon. It comprises the "Agamemnon," "Choephoræ," and "Eumenides."

Orestes (ō-res'tēz). [Gr. Ὀρέστης.] In Greek legend, the son of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra, and brother of Electra. He slew Clytemnestra and Ægisthus, and was pursued by the Erinyes. He was a favorite subject of the Greek tragic poets. See Electra.

Orestes. A play of Euripides, exhibited in 409 B. C.

> In the looseness and carelessness of the metre, in the crowding of incidents at the end of the play, in the low tone of its morality – they are all base, says the scholiast, except Pylades, and yet even he advises a cold-blooded murder for revenge's sake – there is no play of Euripides so disagreeable. On the other hand, for dramatic effect, as the same scholiast observes, there is none more striking; but this applies only to the opening scenes.
> Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I. 361.

Orestes. Killed 476 A.D. Regent of the Western Empire in the reign of his son Romulus Augustulus (475–476).

> The army had revolted, and the commander-in-chief, an Illyrian named Orestes, had seized the reins of government. This Orestes had a strange history. About thirty years before the date of the event just mentioned, his native country – the northern part of what is now called Croatia – had been given up by the Romans to the Huns. Orestes, who was then quite a young man, finding himself one of Attila's subjects, offered his services to the Hunnish king, and seems to have acted as his secretary. In this capacity he was in no small degree a man in a mission from Attila to the eastern emperor, Theodosius II., and we read of his being terribly indignant because he was not regarded as a person of equal consequence with his fellow-envoy, Edeco the Scythian. By what curious chances it came about that the former secretary of Attila now found himself at the head of the Roman army, and master of the Roman state, history does not tell. Orestes did not choose to call himself emperor, thinking, perhaps, that it was safer for the wearer of the diadem and the real holder of power to be different persons. He contented himself with the title of Patrician, the same which had been borne by Rikimer and by Aetius, and bestowed the imperial crown on his son, a boy of fourteen, who was named Romulus after his maternal grandfather. Bradley, Story of the Goths, p. 126.

Orestes and Electra. 1. A group in marble, probably a late Greek original, in the Villa Ludovisi, Rome. A woman, already full-grown, rests her arm kindly on the shoulder of a handsome boy, who is speaking to her.

2. An interesting group of antique sculpture in the Museo Nazionale, Naples. Electra clad in the long tunic, stands with her arm about her brother's neck. This work belongs to the school of pasiteles, of the early empire.

Oretani (or-e-tā'ni). In ancient geography, a people in southern Spain, living in the Sierra Morena and neighboring regions.

Oreus (ō'rē-us), or Histiæa (his-ti-ē'ä). [Gr. Ὠρεός, Ἱστιαία.] In ancient geography, a city on the southwestern coast of Eubœa, Greece, situated opposite Thessaly.

> Histiæa, afterwards called Oreus, was the most important town of northern Eubœa, and gave name to a considerable tract which has been already mentioned as Histiæotis. It lay about midway in the northern coast of the island, at the western extremity of a broad plain, and by the side of a small river called the Callas. Its remains are found in this position, and some of its coins bear Oreos. We learn from Theopompus that when Pericles conquered Eubœa and expelled the Histiæans, while they sought a refuge in Macedonia, 2,000 Athenian colonists took their place, and colonised Oreus, which had before been a township of Histiæa. Rawlinson, Herod., IV. 277, note.

Orfeo (or-fā'ō). A dramatic pastoral by Polizano, produced in 1483. It was the first pastoral written in the language of the country to which dramatic action was given.

Orfeo ed Euridice (or-fā'ō ed ā-ō-rē'dē-che) Orpheus and Eurydice). An opera by Gluck, words by Calsabigi, produced at Vienna in 1762. In 1774 it was produced at Paris as "Orphée et Euridice," where it was very successful. The libretto was translated from the Italian by Moline. See Orpheus.

Orfila (or-fē-lä'), Matthieu Joseph Bonaventure. Born at Mahon, Balearic Islands, April 24, 1787: died at Paris, March 12, 1853. A French physician and chemist, noted as a writer on toxicology and medical jurisprudence. Among his writings are "Toxicologie générale" (1819), "Traité de médecine légale" (1847), etc.

Orford (ōr'fōrd). A town in the county of Suffolk, England, situated near the North Sea 17 miles east-northeast of Ipswich. Population (1891), 1,735.

Orford, Earls of. See Russell and Walpole.

Organic Statute. A Russian edict of 1832, by which Poland lost its constitution.

Organ (ōr'gan) Mountains, Pg. Serra dos Orgãos. A group of mountains of the Brazilian coast range, at the head of the Bay of Rio de Janeiro. They attain the height of 7,325 feet, and are remarkable for their strange forms, one peak, called the Dedo de Deos ('Finger of God'), appears from the bay like a finger pointing upward.

Organon (ōr'ga-non). [Gr. ὄργανον, an instrument, organ.] The logical treatises of Aristotle. The name was originally applied to the logical theory of demonstration, and then by the Peripatetics to the whole of logic, especially to the topics of Aristotle or the rules for probable reasoning, as being only an instrument or aid to philosophy, and not meriting the higher place of a part of philosophy claimed for it by the Stoics and most of the Academics.

Orgetorix (ôr-jet'ô-riks). A Helvetian conspirator shortly before the time of Cæsar's war with the Helvetians in 58 B. C.

Orgon (or-gôn'). A credulous dupe in Molière's "Tartufe." He has an imbecile infatuation for the hypocritical Tartufe.

Oria (ô're-ä). A town in the province of Lecce, Apulia, Italy, 20 miles southwest of Brindisi. Population (1881), 8,220.

Oriana (ô-ri-an'ä). 1. The legendary mistress of Amadis de Gaul, daughter of Lisuarte, king of England. Queen Elizabeth is frequently called "the peerless Oriana" in the adulatory poems of her time. 2. The principal character in Fletcher's comedy "The Wild Goose Chase," and in Farquhar's comedy "The Inconstant," which is practically the same. She is betrothed to the evasive Mirabell (the "wild goose"), and finally brings him to reason and marries him. 3. A character in Beaumont and Fletcher's play "The Woman-hater"; a teasing, tormenting, brilliant woman.—4. A ballad by Tennyson, published in 1842.

Oriana, The Triumphs of. A collection of madrigals in honor of Queen Elizabeth, compiled and published by Thomas Morley in 1603.

Oribe (ô-rē'bā), Manuel. Born about 1802: died at Montevideo, Nov., 1857. An Uruguayan general and politician. He was minister of war under Rivera 1838–43, and succeeded him as president for four years, March 1, 1835. In 1836 Rivera, at the head of the Colorados party, revolted, and eventually (Oct., 1838) took Montevideo. Oribe then joined with the dictator Rosas in a scheme for making Uruguay with Entre-Ríos a Rosas furnished him with troops, and from 1842 to 1851 he held possession of much of Uruguay and besieged Montevideo at intervals: this period is known as the Nine Years' Siege ("Sitio de Nueve Años"). Eventually Brazil and Entre Ríos interfered, and Oribe capitulated to Urquiza in Oct., 1851. He died in Brazil in Sept., 1857.

Oriel (ō'ri-el) College. A college of Oxford University, founded by Adam de Brome and Edward II. in 1326 (see the extract). The existing buildings date in greater part from the early 17th century. Though the parts are incongruous, the whole is picturesque. On one side of the quadrangle there is a fine range of windows with medieval tracery.

Oriel College, the fifth in antiquity of the colleges that now remain at Oxford, dates its legal existence from the year 1326, although it actually took its origin two years earlier. . . . In 1324 that Edward II. gave formal permission to his almoner, Adam de Brome, to acquire land for the purpose of founding a college which should be styled "The House of the Scholars of St. Mary at Oxford." In accordance with the terms of the royal licence, Adam de Brome bought of Roger Marshall, rector of Tackley, a building known as Tackley's Inn, situated on the south side of the High Street of Oxford, and there he seems to have established his scholars, one of them, set over the rest, being designated the Rector. He also bought for their benefit a house called La Perlise Hall, which stood on the eastern side of Durham College, in the northern suburb. Before long, however, he resolved to place his college under more powerful protection than his own, and with this object surrendered it into the hands of his royal master. Edward II., was, by a transparent fiction, made to appear the founder of the institution which in point of fact he was merely the foster-father. On the 21st of January, 1326, he issued a formal charter of foundation and a code of statutes, both, no doubt, drawn up by his almoner, who caused himself to be appointed the official head of the College, with the title of Præpositus, or Provost.

Lyte, Oxford, p. 141.

Orient (ō'ri-ent), The. [From L. oriens, rising (sc. of the sun).] The East; eastern countries; specifically, the regions to the east and southeast of the leading states of Europe: a vague term, including Asiatic Turkey, Persia, India, Egypt, etc.

Origen (or'i-jen), L. Origenes (ō-rij'e-nēz) (surnamed Adamantius). [Gr. Ὠριγένης Ἀδαμάντιος.] Born probably at Alexandria, 185 or 186 A. D.: died at Tyre, probably 253. One of the Greek fathers of the church. He was educated at Alexandria, and was head of the celebrated catechetical school in that city from about 211 until 231 or 232, when for obscure reasons he was degraded by the synod from the condition of a presbyter to that of a layman. He afterward founded a school at Cæsarea. He was imprisoned in the Decian persecution in 250. He was an extremely prolific author, and wrote on a great variety of subjects pertaining to theology. Among his works are a valuable recension of the Old Testament, entitled "Hexapla," fragments of which have been preserved; and a defense of Christianity against the Epicurean philosopher Celsus.

Origenists (or'i-jen-ists). 1. The followers of Origen of Alexandria; those who held or professed to hold the doctrines held by or attributed to Origen.—2. The members of a sect mentioned by Epiphanius as followers of some unknown person named Origen. He attributes shameful vices to them, but supplies no further information concerning them.

Original Chronicle of Scotland, The. A rimed chronicle by Andrew of Wyntoun, finished between 1420 and 1424. It begins with the angels, follows with Adam and Eve, and continues down to the author's time.

Wyntoun says that he called his chronicle "original" because he designed to trace things from their origin; and he wrote it in nine books in honour of the nine orders of angels.

Origines (ō-rij'i-nēz). [L., 'origins.'] See the extract.

Cato composed also the first Roman historical work in Latin prose, his seven books of Origines, commenced in the later years of his life and continued nearly until his death. The work comprised also the other tribes of Italy, including Greek Italy, at the same time dealing with ethnography and all sides of social life to an extent which remained without imitation. In all the rest, the work was in the manner of the Annalists, now brief, now extensive and even diffusing space for the insertion of complete speeches by the author. Teuffel and Schwabe, Hist. of Roman Lit. (tr. by G. C. W. Warr), I. 174.

Origin of Species, The. A work by Darwin, developing his theory of evolution, published in 1859.

Orinda (ō-rin'dä). The Matchless. See Philips, Katherine.

Orinoco (ō-ri-nō'kō). The northernmost of the three great rivers of South America. It rises in the Parima Mountains, flows northwest, then north and finally east, then northeast, and northward to the delta of the island of Trinidad, about lat. 9–10° N. The upper portion is in a forest region; the lower course is bordered by open plains. It is joined by the Cassiquiare, connected with the Rio Negro, and hence with the Amazon. The chief tributaries are the Guaviare, Meta, Apure, Ventuari, Caura, and Caroni. It was first explored by Diego de Ordaz in 1531. Length, about 1,500 miles (including the Guaviare, about 1,750 to 1,800 miles); navigable about 650 miles to the Cerro "falls" or rapids, and above them for a long distance.

Orion (ō-rī'on). [Gr. Ὠρίων.] 1. In Greek mythology, a giant and hunter. There were various legends about him. He was blinded, with the aid of Dionysus, by Œnopion whose daughter he had ravished; but regained his sight by opening his eyes to the rays of the rising sun. He was slain by Artemis. After his death he was changed to a constellation.—2. Aconstellation situated in the southern hemisphere with respect to the ecliptic, but having the equinoctial crossing it nearly in the middle. This constellation is represented by the figure of a giant with a sword belt. It contains seven stars which are very conspicuous to the naked eye: four of these form a quadrangle, and the other three are situated in the middle of it in a straight line, forming what is called the Belt or Girdle of Orion. They are also popularly called Jacob's Staff, the Ladye's Wand, the Yard-wand, etc. Orion also contains a remarkable nebula.

Oriskany (ō-ris'ka-ni). A village in Oneida County, New York, 7 miles northwest of Utica. Here, Aug. 6, 1777, the Americans under Herkimer defeated the British and Indians. See Herkimer.

Orissa (ō-ris'sä). A province in the southwestern part of the Bengal subordinate ship of Bengal, British India, bordering on the Bay of Bengal. It was formerly a Hindu kingdom; later was under Mogul and Mahratta rule; and was acquired by the British in 1803. Area, 9,023 square miles. Population (1891), 2,853,860.

Oristano (ō-ris-tä'nō). A town in the province of Cagliari, Sardinia, situated on the Tirso, near the western coast, 54 miles north-northwest of Cagliari. It has a cathedral. Population (1881), 7,631.

Orizaba (ō-rē-thä'bä). The (official) capital of the state of Vera Cruz, Mexico, 64 miles westsouthwest of Vera Cruz. Population, about 20,000.

Orizaba, Peak of. An extinct pyramidal volcano, about 10 miles north of Orizaba. It is the highest mountain in Mexico, and the highest in North America except Mount St. Elias. Height (Seovell, 1892), 18,314 feet.

Orkhan (or-khän'). Died 1359. Sultan or emir of the Turks 1326–59, son of Othman.

Orkney (ôrk'ni). A county of Scotland, consisting of the Orkney Islands.

Orkney and Shetland. A former county of Scotland, divided in 1889. See Orkney Islands and Shetland Islands.

Orkney (ôrk'ni) Islands. [Icel. Orkneyjar, Orcades Islands (eq. pl. cognr. island), the first element being prob. confused with orkn, örkn, a seal.] A group of islands north of Scotland, from which they are separated by Pentland Firth: the ancient Orcades. Chief town, Kirkwall. The term is distinct county, and are about 67 in number, 29 being inhabited. The principal island is Mainland; surface generally low (hilly in Hoy and part of Mainland); chief occupations, agriculture and fisheries. The ancient inhabitants were Picts: they were Christianized by Irish missionaries. The islands were acquired by the Northmen in the 8th and 9th centuries, and ruled by jarls. In 1231 they passed to the Earls of Angus, etc., and in 1468 to the Scottish crown. Denmark renounced its claims of sovereignty in 1589. Area, 376 square miles. Population (1891), 59,485.

Orlando (or-lan'dō). 1. The Italian form of Roland (which see).—2. In Shakspere's comedy "As you Like it," the duke Orlando Lamondais's but it begins at a point before the end of Lamondais's work. Orlando's manliness is conspicuous in the first scene of the play.

Orlando Furioso, The History of. A poem by Robert Greene, produced probably about 1588–1589. It was revived in 1626, printed in 1594. Greene makes Orlando marry Angelica.

Orlando Innamorato (on-nä-mo-rä'tō). ["Orlando Enamoured."] A metrical romance by Boiardo, on the love of Orlando or Roland for Angelica. The hero, however, is really Ruggero. Boiardo left it unfinished in 1494, and Ariosto wrote his "Orlando Furioso" as its sequel. Boiardo's poem was remodeled in a lively style by Berni.

Orléanais (or-lā-nā'). An ancient government of France, capital, Orléans. It was bounded by Ile-de-France on the north, Champagne and Burgundy on the east, Nivernais on the southeast, Berry on the south, and Touraine on the west. It comprised, besides Orléans proper, Gâtinais, Beauce, and Blésois. It corresponded mainly to the departments of Loiret, Loir-et-Cher, Eure-et-Loir, and parts of Seine-et-Oise, Indre-et-Loire, Nièvre, Cher, and Sarthe.

Orleanists (or'le-an-ists). In French politics, the adherents of the princes of the Orléans family. The family is descended from a younger brother of Louis XIV., and has furnished one sovereign, Louis-Philippe (who was king 1830–48).

Orléans (or-lā-aṅ'), Eng. Orleans (or'le-anz). [Formerly also Orleannes, ME. Orliens, Orliens, OF. Orliens, Orliens, LL. Aurelianum, or Aurelianensis, Aurelian's (city).] The capital of the department of Loiret, France, situated on the Loire in lat. 47° 54′ N., long. 1° 54′ E.: the medieval Aurelianum, and probably the ancient Genabum. It has important commerce in wool, wines, grain, timber, oil, etc., and manufactures of blankets, hosiery, worsted, vinegar, etc. The cathedral is a building of great size, rebuilt by Henry IV. (begun in 1601) as nearly as the approximations possible to the architecture of the original Painted cathedral destroyed by the Huguenots. The façade, with its 5 portals and 2 lofty towers, is of gingerbread work. The choir has 18 radiating chapels belongs to the earlier church, and is very fine. The five-aisled interior is 486 feet long, and the nave 100 high. Orléans was a town of the Carnutes, and was destroyed by Cæsar, but was rebuilt by Aurelian, occupying an important military position. It was unsuccessfully besieged by Attila in 451; was a leading town from the Merovingian times; and was the chief place of Orléanais. The famous siege of it commenced by the English Oct. 12, 1428, was raised in May, 1429, in consequence of the assaults of the relieving force under Joan of Arc (see the extract). It was a Huguenot event rabout 1562. A victory of the Germans over the French Oct. 11, 1870, was accompanied by the capture of the city. The French retook it in Nov.; but in the severe fighting of Dec. 2–4 they were worsted, and the Germans again occupied it. Population (1891), 63,705.

The Loire, flowing first northwards, then westwards, protects, by its broad sickle of waters, this portion of Gaul, and the Loire itself is commanded at its most northerly point by that city which, known in Cæsar's day as Genabum, had taken the name Aureliani from the great Emperor, the conqueror of Zenobia, and is now called Orléans. Three times has Aurelian played an eminent part in the history of Gaul. There broke out there, in the winter of B. C. 52 against the victorious Cæsar, their Attila—lost, in A. D. 451, received their first repulse; and there in 1429, the zenith of Joanne Darc's fortune, the Duke of Bedford to raise the siege, wrested from the English Plantagenets their last chance of ruling in France.

Hodgkin, Italy and her Invaders, II. 382.

Orléans, Charles, Duc d'. Born May 26, 1391: died Jan. 4, 1465. A French poet, son of Louis, duc d'Orléans. He was taken prisoner by the English at Agincourt in 1415, and released in 1440. His poems were edited by d'Héricault in 1874.

The life of this poet . . . falls into three divisions. In the first, when after his father's death he held the position of a great feudal prince almost independent of royal control, it is not recorded that he produced any literary work. His long captivity in England was more fruitful, and during it he wrote both in French and in English. But the last five-and-twenty years of his life, when he lived quietly and kept court at Blois (bringing about him the literary men of the time from Boucicault to Villon, and engaging with them in poetical tournaments), were the most productive. His undoubted work is not large, but the pieces which compose it are among the best of the age.

Ormulum (ôr'mū-lum). A series of metrical homilies on the New Testament, with paraphrases, composed by Orm or Ormin in the first part of the 13th century. He was an Augustinian canon, and it is assumed that he lived in Lincolnshire or Nottinghamshire, but there are arguments in favor of Ormskirk in Lancashire. Orm had a phonetic system of his own, distinguishing the short vowels by doubling the following consonant. The Ormulum was first edited from the MS. by Robert Meadows White in 1852.

The intention of his work corresponded to that of the Scripture Paraphrase of Caedmon, although it differed much in plan and execution. His work is called, from his own name, the Ormulum.

"This boc his nemnned Orrmulum
Forrthi that Orrm itt wrohhte."

But though the author there, for a purpose, calls himself Orm. he says elsewhere that he was named Ormin. There remains only a portion of the work, and it is in a single MS. which forms a folio volume in the Junian collection, now preserved in the Bodleian.

Morley, English Writers, III. 232.

Ormus (ôr'mus), or Hormuz (hôr'muz). An ancient and medieval city situated on the southern coast of Persia at the entrance of the Persian Gulf. It was removed to a neighboring island in the Strait of Ormus about 1300, became an emporium of commerce and noted for its wealth; became dependent on Portugal in 1514; and was taken from it in 1622 by the Shah of Persia, assisted by the English. It is now in ruins. Milton celebrates "the wealth of Ormus and of Ind" ("Paradise Lost," ii. 2).

Orosius (ō-rō'si-us), Paulus. Born in Spain (probably at Tarragona); lived in the first part of the 5th century A. D. A Latin historian and theologian. He wrote an epitome of history directed against the pagans: "Historiarum libri vii adversus paganos" (translated into Anglo-Saxon by Alfred the Great).

Paulus Orosius, a native of Tarragona in Spain, and a friend of Augustine, wrote his Seven Books of "Histories" about the year 417, while he was still a young man ("rehiscous juvenis"), at the request of the Bishop of Hippo. They were to form a history of the world from the Deluge down to his own time (the last entry relates to the year 417), and the object of the book was to show that bloodshed, oppression, and misery had ever been the staple of human history, and that "Christian times" were unjustly blamed for the woes which the barbarians were then inflicting on the empire. . . . Vague, passionate, and declamatory, Orosius represents only the narrow prejudices of an orthodox provincial of the empire in his judgments concerning the men and the events of that mighty crisis.

Osiris (ō-sī'ris). [L. Osiris, Gr. Ὄσιρις, also Ὄσορις, from Egyptian Hesiri.] In Egyptian mythology, one of the chief gods, the principle of good, the creator, the foe of evil, the god of the Nile, in constant conflict with his brother or son Set (the Greek Typhon), the god of evil, of darkness, of the desert. Osiris is vanquished and slain, but revives, and is avenged by Horus and Thoth—evidently a personification of the phenomena of the rising and setting sun. He was the guardian of mankind in the state after death, and a judge of the dead, and a type of the sufferings and triumphs of humanity. In one form (the Osiris of Mendes) he personified the male principle. In art he was portrayed as a mummy wearing the crown of Upper Egypt, usually flanked by goat-headed pillars.

> People do not yet agree as to the original character of Osiris. Maspero tried to discover the development of this god, and maintains that Osiris was originally and essentially a god of the dead, the first man, son of the heaven and earth, and as such the god of the dead. He also says that the original home of Osiris was not at Abydus, but in the Delta: at Busiris and Mendes. However this may be, Osiris was to the Egyptians above all things a god of the dead, more especially in a beneficial way as Onnoris. But he was identified, at an early date, with the sun: chapter seventeen of the Book of the Dead calls "Ra the soul of Osiris, and Osiris the soul of Ra."

Ostrogoths (os'trō-goths). The eastern branch of the Gothic race. While dwelling in southern Russia near the valley of the Don, they were attacked about A. D. 375 by the Huns, were subjugated, and with the Huns pushed the Visigoths to the borders of the Roman Empire. After the Visigothic victory at Adrianople in 378, many Ostrogoths settled in Pannonia. Many of them joined later the army of Attila, and after his death were employed by the Eastern emperors to defend the lower Danube. Theodoric became their king in 476, and in 493 led the nation over the Julian Alps, conquered Odoacer in 493 at Ravenna, and became king of Italy. Under his rule (see Theodoric) the country prospered. Belisarius tried to expel the Goths, and in 552 they were finally defeated by the Byzantine general Narses. Italy was temporarily regained for the empire, and the Goths were absorbed in other peoples.

The real history of the Goths begins about the year 245, when they were living near the mouths of the Danube under the rule of Ostrogothа [Austragata], the first king of the Amaling stock. Ostrogothа was celebrated by tradition for his "patience"; but in what way he displayed that virtue we are not informed, for history tells only of his victories. Whether on account of his patience or his deeds in war, his fame was widely spread; for one of the oldest Anglo-Saxon poems mentions him as "Eastgota, the father of Unwēn." The name of this son is given by Jordanes as Hunuil, but probably the Anglo-Saxon form is the right one. Bradley, Story of the Goths, p. 24.

Othello (ō-thel'ō), the Moor of Venice, The Tragedy of. A tragedy by Shakspere, acted Nov. 1, 1604, and printed in 1622 in a quarto and in the first folio edition. It was founded on one of Giraldi's novels in the "Hecatommithi" (iii. 3). Othello is a high-minded Moor in the military service of Venice. He is aroused to fury against his wife Desdemona by the insinuations of Iago, and smothers her.

I have often told you that I do not think there is any jealousy, properly so called, in the character of Othello. There is no predisposition to suspicion, which I take to be an essential term in the definition of the word. Desdemona very truly told Emilia that he was not jealous, that is, of a jealous habit, and he says so as truly of himself. Iago's suggestions, you see, are quite new to him; they do not correspond with anything of a like nature previously in his mind. If Desdemona had, in fact, been guilty, no one would have thought of calling Othello's conduct that of a jealous man. He could not otherwise than he did with the lights he had; whereas jealousy can never be strictly right. See how utterly unlike Othello is to Leontes in the "Winter's Tale," or even to Leontius in "Cymbeline"! The jealousy of the first proceeds from an evident trifle, and something like hatred is mingled with it; and the conduct of Leontius in accepting the wager, and engaging his wife in the trial, denotes a jealous temper already formed. Coleridge, Table-Talk, June 24, 1827.

Othman (oth-mān'). Born about 575: killed at Medina, Arabia, 656. Calif of the Moslems 644–656, successor of Omar. He extended the califate by conquests in Persia, Africa, and the island of Cyprus. Otomacs (ō-tō-mäks'), or Otomacos (ō-tō-mäk'kōs). A tribe of Indians who, in the 18th and early in the 19th century, lived along the middle Orinoco, from the junction of the Meta to that of the Arauca. They were very degraded savages, and were remarkable for their custom of eating enormous quantities of clay during seasons of scarcity. The Jesuits endeavored, with little success, to gather the Otomacs into their mission villages. Later they disappeared from the river shores, and the tribe is now either extinct or lives in a remote part of the llanos. The Otomac language, from the little that is known of it, appears to constitute a distinct stock.

Otomis (ō-tō-mēs'). [Nahuatl otomitl, wanderer.] A tribe of Indians of the Mexican plateau. At the time of the conquest they dwelt principally in the mountainous district west of the Mexican lakes, and had long been, in some sense, subdued by the Aztecs. According to traditions they were one of the oldest nations of the plateau, and dated their origin before the Toltec invasion. They were agriculturists and used cotton clothes and gold and copper ornaments, but were much less advanced in civilization than their descendants of Mexico they joined Cortes (June, 1521). They have ever since been nominally subject to the whites, and are Catholics, but have acquired little civilization. Their descendants of pure blood probably number more than 200,000, and are scattered through Central Mexico. Also written Othomis, Othomies. See Otomi stock, below.

Otomi stock (ō-tō-mē' stok). Alinguistic stock of Mexican Indians, embracing a number of tribes, with closely allied dialects, which occupy portions of the states of Mexico, Morelos, Hidalgo, Querétaro, Guanajuato, and San Luis Potosí. Among the more important branches are the Otomis proper, the Mecos or Jonaz in Querétaro, and the Pames, all, or nearly all, pagans in their religion, but have retained many of their aboriginal customs and their language. This is very harsh and difficult, and consists largely of monosyllables. In stature these Indians are rather short, and their color is dark. They are said to number nearly 800,000.

Otranto (ō-trän'tō). A small seaport in the province of Lecce, Apulia, Italy, 46 miles southeast of Brindisi: the ancient Hydrus or Hydruntum. It was a flourishing ancient and medieval city until it was captured by the Turks in 1480. The cathedral is 3-aisled basilica with 3 apses and a remarkable pavement in mosaic (1163) of biblical scenes, animals, etc.

Otto (or Otho) I., "The Great." Born 912: died at Memleben, Prussian Saxony, May 7, 973. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire. He was the son of Henry I., whom he succeeded as king of Germany in 936. The early part of his reign was occupied in subduing his turbulent nobles. He put an end to the incursions of the Bohemians, the Wends and the Danes, and in 951 went to the support of Adelaide, queen of Lombardy, against Berengar II. He defeated Berengar and married Adelaide. In 955 he inflicted a decisive defeat on the Magyars on the Lechfeld. In 962 he was crowned emperor at Rome, reviving the office founded by Charlemagne.

Otto II. Born 955: died at Rome, Dec. 7, 983. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire 973–983, son of Otto I. and Adelaide. He subdued, as result of his cousin Henry, duke of Bavaria, about 976. In 978 the French invaded Lorraine, but were expelled by the emperor, who unsuccessfully besieged Paris. He married the Greek princess Theophano. In 982 he invaded lower Apulia and Calabria in southern Italy. His claims were resisted by the Greeks with the assistance of the Saracens. After some successes he was defeated, near Crotona, in 982.

Otto III., called "The Wonder of the World" (from his intellectual endowments). Born 980, died at Paterno, near Viterbo, Italy, Jan., 1002. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire 983–1002, son of Otto II. During his minority the regency was conducted by his mother Theophano; he became father death by the Archbishop of Mainz, and his grandmother Adelaide in Italy. He assumed the reins of government in 995. He aimed to make Rome the imperial residence and center of a new universal empire, but died at the early age of twenty-two.

Otto IV. Born about 1174; died at the Harzburg, Germany, May 19, 1218. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, second son of Henry the Lion, duke of Saxony and Bavaria. He was elected king of Germany in opposition to Philip of Swabia in 1198, and was crowned emperor in 1209. He afterward became involved in a quarrel with the Pope, who in 1212 put forward Frederick II. as anti-emperor. Having allied himself with England, he concerted an invasion of France with John Lackland, with whom he was defeated at Bouvines in 1214. Discredited by this defeat, he presently withdrew to his hereditary domain of Brunswick.

He received the cardinalate in 1689, but is principally noted as a patron of art. He collected a fine library, containing manuscript masses by Palestrina and other great masters, etc., which after his death were purchased by Pope Benedict XIV. and presented to the Vatican.

Ottocar (ot'ō-kär). Killed 1278. King of Bohemia 1253–78. He acquired Austria and Styria by marriage, and inherited Carinthia. For these German fiefs he refused to do homage to Rudolph of Hapsburg, king of Germany, who in consequence declared war against him. He was defeated and killed on the Marchfeld in 1278.

Ottoman Empire. See Turkey.

Ottomans (ot'ō-manz). [From Ottoman = Sp. Otomano = Pg. Othomano, from Turk. 'Othman, 'Osmanli, the founder of the Turkish empire in Asia: see Osmanli. Cf. Othmanna.] That branch of the Turks which founded and rule the Turkish empire. The Ottoman Turks lived originally in central Asia. Under their first sultan, Othman (reigned 1288–1326), they founded a realm in Asia Minor, which was soon extended into Europe. With the capture of Constantinople in 1453 they succeeded to the Byzantine empire and their rule, at its height in the 16th century, included over the greater part of southeastern Europe and much of western Asia and northern Africa. They have since lost Hungary, Rumania, Servia, Greece, etc., and practically Bulgaria, Egypt, etc. The Ottoman Turks are Sunnite Mohammedans, and regard the sultans as representatives of the former califfs.

He studied at the University of Edinburgh and at the medical school of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, London, and became a member of the Royal College of Surgeons in 1826. He afterward became assistant curator of the Hunterian Museum, and in 1834 professor of comparative anatomy at St. Bartholomew's Hospital. He was appointed Hunterian professor of anatomy and physiology in the College of Surgeons in 1836, and in 1856 superintendent of the natural history department in the British Museum. He was created Knight commander of the Bath on his retirement in 1883. Among his works are "Odontography" (1840–45), "Archetype and Homologies of the Vertebrate Skeleton" (1848), "On Parthenogenesis" (1849), "Anatomy of the Vertebrates" (1866–68).

Owen, Robert. Born at Newtown, Montgomeryshire, Wales, May 14, 1771: died there, Nov. 17, 1858. The founder of English socialism. He became at nineteen manager of a cotton-mill at Manchester, and in 1799 became manager and partner of the cotton mills at New Lanark. Here he introduced extensive reforms looking to an improvement in the condition of his operatives. In 1825 he founded a socialistic community at New Harmony, Indiana, which failed in 1827. He severed his connection with the mills at New Lanark in 1828, and devoted himself to the propagation of socialism. The history of English socialism is commonly divided from 1817, in which year he communicated a report on the poor law to a committee of the House of Commons.

He recommended that communities of about twelve hundred persons should be settled on a tract of land of from 1,000 to 1,500 acres, all living in one large building in the form of a square, with public kitchen and messrooms. Each family should have its own private apartments, and the entire care of the children of the age of three, after which they should be brought up by the community, their parents having access to them at meals and at other proper times. These communities might be established by individuals, by parishes, by counties, or by the state; in every case there should be effective supervision by duly qualified persons. Work, and the employment of its results, should be in common. The size of his community was no doubt partly suggested by his village of New Lanark, which numbered 2,500 when he took over the mills. He considered the latter as a mere scheme as the best form for the reorganization of society in general. Thomas Kirkup, in Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 87.

Owen, Robert Dale. Born at Glasgow, Nov. 7, 1801: died near Lake George, N. Y., June 25, 1877. An American social reformer, politician, spiritualist, and author; son of Robert Owen. He was many years in congress, and for many years noted as an advocate of negro emancipation. Among his works are "Footfalls on the Boundary of Another World" (1860), "The Debatable Land between this World and the Next" (1872), "Beyond the Mystic Veil" (1874), etc.

It is bounded by Warwick and Northampton on the north, Buckingham on the east, Berkshire on the south, and Berkshire and Gloucester on the west, and is separated from Berkshire by the Thames. The surface is undulating, but not hilly. The county was long noted for its forests. The chief occupation is agriculture. Area, 750 square miles. Population (1891), 185,869.

Oxford. The capital of Oxfordshire, England, situated at the junction of the Cherwell with the Thames, in lat. 51° 45′ N., long. 1° 16′ W.: the medieval Oxenaford and Oxenford, and Latin Oxonia. It is chiefly noted as the seat of Oxford University. The old cathedral (Christchurch) is the main (late Norman building with round-arched triforium and fine tower; the new has a wooden roof; the choir is vaulted with pendants. There are a number of interesting tombs, and some fine glass, both pre-Reformation and modern. The magnificent Gothic tower is Early English, finely arcaded: there is a chapter-house of the same date, and a Perpendicular cloister. The authentic annals of Oxford begin in 912, when it was occupied by Edward the Elder, a king of the West Saxons. It was a place of strategical importance, and one of the political centers in the middle ages. It was a meeting-place of the witenagemot. Harold Harefoot was proclaimed king there in 1035, and died there in 1039. The population in the time of Edward the Confessor is estimated at upward of 8,000, and in 1327, when the town was besieged by Stephen in 1141–42, Matilda crossing them over the frozen river. The city was the headquarters of Charles in the civil war. It was taken by Fairfax after a storm under Lambert in 1646. Population (1891), 35,241.

There are also two public halls (St. Mary Hall and St. Edmund Hall) and two private halls (Charsley's Hall and Turrell's Hall). Among the institutions connected with the university are the Bodleian Library (which see), Radcliffe Library, Ashmolean Museum, Clarendon Press, Taylor Institution, University Observatory, University Museum, Botanic Garden, and Indian Institute. University sermons are mostly preached at St. Mary's Church, a fine old building (of the 15th and 16th centuries) in High street, which has always been closely connected with the university. The three governing bodies are the Convocation, which includes all who continue members of the university; the Congregation of the University, consisting of the resident members; and the Hebdomadal Council, consisting of the chancellor, vice-chancellor, proctors, and its elected members. The undergraduates numbered 3,197 in 1893.

Pacaguaras (pä-kä-gwä'räs). An Indian tribe of northern Bolivia and Brazil, living about the rapids of the upper Madeira, Beni, and Mamoré. They are savages of a rather low grade, living in small villages and subsisting mainly by hunting and fishing. They have always been friendly to the whites, and during the 18th century some of them were gathered into mission villages, which were subsequently abandoned. Dorbigny believed that they were allied to the Mojos, but Dr. Brinton has referred their language to the Pano stock (which see). A few hundreds remain. Also written Pacavaras, Pacuvaras.

Pacajas (pä-kä-zhäs'). An Indian tribe of the lower Amazon, which formerly occupied much of the mainland on both sides of the island of Marajó. They were of Tupi stock, lived in large villages, and were agriculturists. Their descendants are merged in the country population of the same region.

Pacaraima (pä-kä-rī'mä), Sierra or Serra de. A range of low mountains between Venezuela on the north and Brazil on the south, extending into British Guiana. They are continuous with the Parima Range, and both are edges of a tableland. The highest peak is Roraima, on the confines of Guiana (about 7,500 feet).

It was a sacred place of the Incas: according to one of their legends, Manco Capac issued from it with three brothers. Also Paccaritampu.

Pachacamac (päch-ä-kä'mäk). [Quichua, 'founder of the world.'] One of the names given by the ancient Peruvians to the supreme deity, otherwise called Uiracocha (which see).

Pachacamac, a town and temple of ancient Peru, on the coast, at the mouth of the river Lurin, about 20 miles south of Lima. The temple was dedicated to Pachacamac, who, in this case, had perhaps come to be regarded as a local deity. Old historians state that it was much frequented by pilgrims from all parts of the country. The shrine and wooden image of Pachacamac were destroyed by Hernando Pizarro in 1533. The existing ruins of the building are very extensive, and, according to Squier, are not of the Inca type of architecture and appear to be very ancient. There are other and more modern ruins of Incarian type, including what is supposed to have been a house of the virgins of the sun. A small village remains on the site.

Pachacutec Yupanqui. See Yupanqui.

Pacheco (pä-chā'kō), Francisco. Born at Seville, Spain, 1571: died at Seville, 1654. A Spanish painter and writer on art, author of "Arte de la pintura" ("Art of Painting," 1649).

He was governor of Galicia, and viceroy of Mexico Oct. 31, 1624, to Sept. 16, 1635, succeeding the Marquis of Gelves, who had been deposed by the audience (see Carrillo de Mendoza y Pimentel). He was an able and efficient ruler, and on his return was made a councilor of the Indies.

Pachino (pä-kē'nō). A town in the province of Syracuse, Sicily, situated on the coast 24 miles southeast of that of Syracuse. Population (1881), 7,430; commune, 8,574.

Pachmann, pächʻmän). Vladimir de. Born at Odessa, July 27, 1848. A noted Russian pianist. He was a pupil of his father, an amateur violinist, and of Dachs at Vienna. He made his first appearance in 1868, but did not play regularly till 1874, since which time he has had much success both in Europe and in the United States, especially as an interpreter of Chopin.

Pachomius (pa-kō'mi-us). Saint. Born probably in Lower Egypt, about 292: died about 349. One of the founders of monasticism. He established a monastery on the island of Tabenna in the Nile, and was the first thus to collect the monks under one roof and establish strict rules of government for the community.

Pachuca (pä-chō'kä), or Hidalgo (ē-däl'gō). The capital of the state of Hidalgo, Mexico, situated about 50 miles northeast of Mexico. Population (1889), 32,815.

Shortly after the Conquest a shepherd discovered the rich silver workings here (at Pachuca), and a mining camp at once sprung up that about 1534 was made a town. Here was invented in 1557, by Bartolomé de Medina, the so-called "patio process" for the amalgamation of silver ore. Among the more famous of the ancient mines was the Trinidad, whence was extracted $40,000,000 in silver in ten years. The period of the revolt against Spain, and of the subsequent civil wars, reduced the fortunes of the city to a very low depth. It was seized and sacked by revolutionists. April 25, 1812, when $500,000 worth of silver was taken from the city, and the records of the mines were destroyed. Until 1850 its fortunes continued to decline, and its population greatly diminished. In this year the Rosario Mine came into bonanza—at once reviving the city's declining prosperity. James Mex. Guide, 245.

Pacific (pä-sifʻik), The. See Pacific Ocean.

Pacific, War of the. [Sp. Guerra del Pacifico.] The name commonly given to the war waged by Chile against Bolivia and Peru 1879–83. It arose from claims made by Chile to the nitrate regions of Atacama, Bolivia, and, later, to adjoining regions in Peru. In Feb., 1879, the Chileans seized Antofagasta, Bolivia. Bolivia declared war on March 1. Peru offered her intervention, was met by demands which she refused, and Chile declared war on Peru April 5. Thereafter Peru and Bolivia acted as allies. The principal subsequent events were: Iquique besieged, May 5; naval engagement there, May 21; Peruvian ironclad Huascar taken by the Chileans off Point Angamos, Oct. 8; Pisagua taken by the Chileans, Nov. 2; allies defeated at San Francisco, Nov. 19; Peruvian victory at Tarapacá, Nov. 27; Chilean victory at Los Angeles, near Moquegua, March 22, 1880; Chilean victory at Tacna, May 26; Callao blockaded April 10, bombarded May 26; Arica bombarded by the Chileans June 5, taken June 7; Chilean victory at Chorrillos, Jan. 13, 1881; at Miraflores, Jan. 15; Lima taken, Jan. 17. There were many subsequent engagements, often bloody, but unimportant in their results. A preliminary treaty of peace between Chile and Peru was signed at Ancon Oct. 20, 1883, and ratified April 4, 1884. (See Iglesias, Miguel.) A treaty of peace between Chile and Bolivia was signed Dec. 11, 1883. By these treaties all the coast region of Bolivia, and Tarapacá in Peru, were permanently ceded to Chile. She was to hold Arica and Tacna for ten years. Chile obtained other important advantages relating to the guano deposits. The Chileans evacuated Lima, Oct. 22, 1883.

Pacific Ocean, or South Sea. [F. Océan Pacifique, or Océan Austral ('southern ocean'), or Mer du Sud ('south sea'), Sp. Mar Pacífico, NL. Mare Pacificum ('pacific sea'), G. Stilles Meer ('still sea'), or Südsee ('south sea'.)] That part of the ocean which extends westward from North America and South America to the eastern coast of Asia, the Malay Archipelago, and Australia; so named by Magellanes, the first to navigate it (1520), who found it calm after his experience of storms. It communicates by Bering Strait with the Arctic ocean on the north. Its southern boundary is arbitrary, some separating it from the Antarctic Ocean by the Antarctic circle, while others push on a "southern ocean" the northern limit of which is lat. 40 S. It is regarded as divided by the equator into the North and South Pacific. Its chief gulfs, etc., are Behring Sea, Gulf of Georgia and Puget Sound, Gulf of California, Gulf of Tehuantepec, Bay of Panama, Yellow Sea, Sea of Japan, and Sea of Okhotsk. The principal currents are the equatorial, Peruvian, and Japanese. The Pacific was first seen by Balboa in 1513, was first navigated by Magellan in 1520, and was explored by Drake, Dampier, Anson, and numerous later navigators. Several steamer lines (Pacific Mail, Panamanian Line, etc.) traverse it. Greatest breadth from east to west, about 10,000 miles. Area estimated about 70,000,000 square miles. Greatest known depth, over 27,000 feet.

Pacini (pä-chē'nē). Giovanni. Born at Syracuse, Sicily, Feb. 11, 1796: died near Peschia, Dec. 6, 1867. An Italian composer. He wrote about 80 operas, among the best of which are "Niobe" (1826), "Saffo" (1840), "Medea" (1843), and "La Regina di Cipro" (1846). He organized a musical institute at Viareggio, and afterward removed to Lucca, where he trained many pupils who became celebrated.

Padua (pad'ū-ä). A province in the compartimento of Venetia, Italy. Area, 823 square miles. Population (1891), 434,322.

Padua, It. Padova (pä'dō-vä), F. Padoue (pä-dö'). The capital of the province of Padua, Italy, situated on the Bacchiglione in lat. 45° 24' N., long. 11° 51' E.; the Roman Patavium. Among the chief objects of interest are the churches of San Antonio, Eremitani, and Santa Giustina, cathedral, university, botanic garden, Scuola del Santo, parvenu palace, Loggia del Consiglio, and Palazzo Municipio (noted for its great hall). The Baptistery of the Duomo, an early-Romanesque building, is chiefly remarkable for its beautiful outer fresco of the School of Giotto. The church of the Eremitani, now the University Chapel, a large church of 1250, restored, contains many interesting mediæval and Renaissance tombs, notably those of the Carraras. The Loggia del Consiglio, an interesting early-Renaissance building, begun 1493, has below an open vaulted hall with widely spaced columns, and above a finely decorated saloon with three monumental windows. The Palazzo della Ragione was begun in 1172 as a court of justice. The lower story consists of two vaults surrounded by arcaded loggias for trading booths. Above is an arcaded gallery with a sculptured frieze. In the second story is the famous Salone, a hall 256 feet long, 86 wide, and 79 high, whose enormous arched roof is entirely without intermediate supports. The walls of the Salone are covered with very curious mystical frescos; and the hall itself serves as a public museum for mediæval sculpture, containing among other relics the reputed bones of Livy. Padua was a very important Roman town; belonged to the Guelphs in the middle ages, and was a center of literature and art; and came under Venetian rule in 1405. Population (1892), 79,500.

Padua, University of. One of the oldest and most celebrated universities of Europe, founded in the 13th century: especially famous for its faculties of law and medicine. It had 63 teachers and 1,316 students in 1890-91.

Pæan (pē'an). In Greek mythology, a surname of Apollo and of other gods.

Pæonia (pē-ō'ni-ä). In ancient geography, a region in the interior of Macedonia.

Pæonius (pē-ō'ni-us). [Gr. Παίονιος.] A Greek sculptor of Mende in Thrace. His statue of Nike on a pillar, described by Pausanias, was discovered in 1875 with its inscription, and gives a perfect idea of this master's style. The eastern pediment of the Zeus temple discovered at the same time, and ascribed by Pausanias to Paeonius, is much inferior.

Paer (pi-är'), Ferdinando. Born at Parma, Italy, June 1, 1771: died at Paris, May 3, 1839. An Italian composer of opera. He was appointed maître de chapelle by Napoleon, and went to Paris in 1807; was director of the Italian opera there 1812-27; and was director of the king's chamber music in 1832. His works include "Camilla" (1801), "Sargino" (1803), and "Leonora" (1804).

Paes (pä-äs'), or (by a double plural) Paezes (pä-ä'zäz). An Indian tribe of Colombia, in the mountains of the Central Cordillera, departments of Tolima and Antioquia. They were formerly powerful, and were at war with the Chibchas before the Spanish conquest. At present about 2,000 remain in a semi-independent state. They have fixed villages, practise agriculture on a small scale, and are noted hunters: though living at high altitudes, they go nearly naked. Their language is closely related to that of the Paniquitas (which see). See also Pijaos.

Pæstum (pes'tum), originally Posidonia (pos-i-dō'ni-ä). [Gr. Ποσειδωνία, Ποσειδωνία.] In ancient geography, a city in Lucania, Magna Græcia, Italy, situated near the sea in lat. 40° 25' N., long. 15° 2' E. It was a Greek city, a colony of Sybaris, founded about 600 B. C., and brought under Roman domination after the failure of Pyrrhus's invasion in 273 B. C. Under Roman rule it was assimilated and it was finally destroyed by the Saracens in the 9th century. The site is now deserted. The Greek walls are still standing throughout their circuit of 2½ miles, with 8 towers and 4 gates, more or less ruined. The plan is approximately trapezoidal. Within the walls the three archaic Doric temples form, from their remarkable state of preservation, the most impressive group of architectural groups existing, except the monuments of Athens. Besides these beautiful temples, little is visible except remains of a Roman amphitheater, theater, and villas. The plan is approximately trapezoidal. The Pæstum are not mentioned by ancient writers, and were unknown to modern scholars until described by Antonini in 1745. The temple of Neptune, so called, is one of the finest two-columned Greek Doric temples, retaining all its exterior columns and most of those of the interior, and majestic in its aspect. It is peripteral, hexastyle, with 14 columns on the flanks, counting the angle ones as single, measuring 80 by 197 feet. There was an interior portico before the pronaos, and no opisthodomos; the cella, however, had a rear chamber separated by about one third of its length, with a door in the back. Though many architectural details appear debased, the temple probably dates from the early 6th century B. C. The Basilica, so called, is a Doric peripteral structure of 9 by 18 columns, measuring 80 by 178 feet, on a stylobate of 3 steps. There are 5 columns between ante in the pronaos, and the cella is divided longitudinally by a row of columns. A reasonable explanation of this unusual plan is that the temple was double, one half being dedicated presumably to Demeter (Ceres) and the other to Persephone. Many minor architectural details which have been thought to indicate a late date, the temple probably belongs to the first part of the 6th century B. C.

Paez (pä'äth), José Antonio. Born in the province of Barinas, June 13, 1790: died in New York city, May 7, 1873. A Venezuelan general and politician. He was a distinguished cavalry leader in the war for independence; captured Puerto Cabello the last Spanish post in Venezuela, in 1823; and under the Colombian republic was military commandant of Venezuela from 1823, and jefe superior, with military and civil powers, from 1827. In 1829-30 he headed the movement by which Venezuela separated from Colombia; was president March 18, 1831, to Feb. 9, 1835, and again Feb. 1, 1839, to Jan. 28, 1843; in the interval between these terms he commanded the army and put down two rebellions. In Jan., 1848, he declared against Monagas, but was eventually defeated, imprisoned Aug., 1849, to May, 1850, and banished for some years. On the deposition of Gual (Aug. 29, 1860), General Paez was proclaimed dictator by the army. He assumed the office Sept. 9, and held it until his final defeat by Falcon and Guzman Blanco, May, 1863. His autobiography was published at New York in 1867.

Paganini (pä-gä-nē'nē), Nicolo. Born at Genoa, Feb. 18, 1784: died at Nice, May 27, 1840. A celebrated Italian violinist. He first appeared in public in 1793 at Genoa. In 1795 he went to Parma, with his father, to study with Rolla. On his return, after a few months, to Genoa he began to compose his "Studies," which were extraordinarily difficult. He commenced his foreign tours alone in 1798; from 1801 till 1805 he did not play in public; he then resumed his concert tours, and soon after became solo player to the court at Lucca. It was here that he became famous for his execution on the single G-string. From this time his success was remarkable, and his bizarre and mysterious appearance added to his fame. It was currently reported that he was a son of the devil, whom he was fancied to resemble.

But, after all, the extraordinary effect of the playing could have had its source only in his extraordinary genius. If genius, as has been justly remarked, is "the power of taking infinite pains," he certainly showed it in a wonderful degree in the power of concentration and perseverance which enabled him to acquire such absolute command of his instrument. Mere perfection of technique, however, would never have thrown the whole musical world into such paroxysms. With the first notes his audience was spell-bound; there was in him—though certainly not the evil spirit suspected by the superstitious—a demoniac element which irresistibly took hold of those that came within his sphere. Grove, Dict. of Music, etc., II. 630.

Pagasæ (pag'a-sē). [Gr. Παγασαί.] In ancient geography, a seaport in the eastern part of Thessaly, Greece, situated at the head of the Pagasæan Gulf, southwest of Pelion. It was the mythical starting-point of the Argonauts.

Page, Thomas Jefferson. Born at Shelby, Gloucester County, Va., Jan. 4, 1808. An American naval officer. As midshipman under the war-engaged 1853-56 in explorations in the Platine region, South America. In Feb., 1855, his vessel, the Water Witch (then in charge of Lieutenant Jeffers), was fired upon by a Paraguayan fort and one man was killed: the fort was stormed. Page resigned early in 1861; entered the Confederate service; was commissioned commodore; and in 1862 was sent to England to take charge of a ram. His ship was not permitted to leave, and he took command of a small ironclad at Copenhagen, but it was soon after seized in a Spanish port. Thus ended his Confederate service. Subsequently he resided in the Argentine and in Florence, Italy. He is the author of "La Plata, the Argentine Confederation, and Paraguay" (1859).

Page, Thomas Nelson. Born in Hanover County, Va., April 23, 1853. An American lawyer and author. He is chiefly noted for his tales and verses in the negro dialect. He attacked the Spaniards, in 1598, and 1599, and in 1598 headed the most successful rising of his tribe: the governor of Chile, Oñez de Loyola, was surprised and killed (Nov. 22, 1598), Villarica, Imperial, and other places were besieged, for several years finally taken, and the Spaniards were driven beyond the Biobio. Also written Paillanachu.

Pailleron (pä-yē-rôn'), Édouard Jules Henri. Born at Paris, Sept. 17, 1834. A French poet and dramatist. He began life as a notary's clerk, incidentally writing poems and plays. On the latter appearance before the public he brought out a short comedy entitled "Le parasite" and a volume of satires, "Les parasites" (1860), followed in 1861 by "Le nuit mitoyen." Further plays are "Le demandeur" (1863), "Le second mouvement" (1865), "Le monde où l'on s'amuse" (1868), "Les faux menages" (1869), "L'Autre motif" (1872), "Hélène" (1874), "Le plus plus" (1875), "L'Age ingrat" (1878), "L'Etincelle" (1879), "Le monde où l'on s'ennuie" (1881), "La souris" (1882), "Les cabotins" (1894). Three of his comedies — "Le chevalier Trumeau," "Le nœud gordien," and "Perrin and Cie" — were published together as "Le théâtre chez Madame" (1881). He married the daughter of M. Buloz, general manager of the "Revue des Deux Mondes," and many of his poems appeared in that publication. Among them are "Le départ" (1870), "Prière pour la France" (1871), and the collection entitled "Amours et haines" (1888). Pailleron was elected to the French Academy in 1881. His inaugural speech, together with his addresses to that body on other occasions, appeared as "Discours académiques" (1886). More recently he wrote the "Portraits et Souvenirs d'Hier" (1889).

Painter, William. Born in Middlesex about 1537; died at London about 1594. The author of a collection of translations called "The Palace of Pleasure." He entered St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1554, and in 1561 was made clerk of the ordnance in the Tower of London. In 1566 he published "The First Tome of the Palace of Pleasure," containing 60 novels. He originally intended it to contain only translations of tales from Livy and the older writers, but altered his plan and added tales taken from Boccaccio, Bandello, Straparola, and other Italian and French novelists. The second volume was published in 1567, containing 34 novels; a third volume, although announced, did not appear. In later editions 6 more novels were added, so that there were 100 novels in all. It is the largest prose work between "Morte d'Arthur" and "Arthur o' Bradley," and its source from which the Elizabethan dramatists took many of their plots.

Paisiello (pä-ē-zē-el'lō), or Paesiello (pä-ā-zē-el'lō), Giovanni. Born at Taranto, Italy, May 9, 1741: died at Naples, June 5, 1816. An Italian composer of operas and church music. He went to Naples when young, and in 1776 to Petersburg, where he produced "Il Barbiere di Siviglia." About 1784 he returned to Naples by way of Vienna, where he wrote "Il Re Teodoro," and was made superintendent to Ferdinand IV. Here he remained for about 15 years, producing some of his best music: after this he went to Paris to organize the music of the chapel of Napoleon, where he composed much religious music. He returned to Italy in 1804. He composed between 90 and 100 operas, and more than 100 masses, etc. Among the operas, besides those mentioned above, are "La serva padrona," "Nina, o la Pazza d'Amore," "La Molinara," etc.

Paisley (pāz'li). A city in Renfrewshire, Scotland, situated on the White Cart, near the Clyde, 7 miles west by south of Glasgow. It is noted for the manufacture of thread, cotton and worsted goods, muslins, prints, starch, soap, corn-flour, machinery, etc., and for its bleaching and dyeing, and was formerly famous for its manufacture of shawls. Its abbey church is of interest: the abbey (at first a priory) was founded about 1164. Population (1891), 66,420.

He was councillor of the Indies; was consecrated bishop of Puebla, Mexico, in Dec., 1639; and at the same time was made visitador-general of New Spain. In the latter capacity he had a dispute with the viceroy Escalona, and his order of the king succeeded him as viceroy June, Nov., 1642. Owing to quarrels with the Jesuits he was deposed in 1647, and in 1649 returned to Spain. In 1653 he was made bishop of Osma. He published numerous historical, judicial, and theological works.

Palaihnihan (pa-lih'ni-han), or Pit River Indians. A linguistic stock of North American Indians which formerly occupied the territory drained by Pit River and its tributaries, from Goose Lake to the mouth of Sapsan Creek, northeastern California. The tribal divisions are Achomawi, Usatge, Atsumawi, Chumawa, Estekowach, Hantiwi, Hunwahh, and Jhuwee: they are almost extinct. A few representatives of the stock are on Round Valley reservation. The name is adapted from the Klamath word palaiwi, meaning 'mountaineer' or 'uplander.'

Palaik. Same as Polarkhekatan.

Palais (pä-lā'). Le. The chief town of the island of Belle-Ile-en-Mer, off the coast of Brittany, department of Morbihan, France. Population (1891), 2,967.

Palais Bourbon (pä-lā' bör-bôñ'). A palace in Paris, now the Chamber of Deputies, begun in 1722. The fine façade toward the Seine was finished in 1807; it has a Roman pedimented colonnade of 12 Corinthian columns with a flight of steps between two projecting piers. The sculptures are by lymphatic-present France, with Liberty, Peace, Order, Agriculture, and Commerce. The halls of the inferior are embellished with many notable paintings and sculptures.

Palais de Justice (de zhüs-tēs'). [F., 'palace of justice.'] A historically and artistically interesting congeries of buildings in Paris, situated on L'Ile de la Cité, at an angle of the Quai de l'Horloge. It is composed in part of portions of the ancient royal palace the Conciergerie, with its three cylindrical stone-roofed towers, and the well-known Sainte Chapelle. Excavations in 1868 disclosed the foundations of the Roman prætorium under the present Palais de Justice. It was the residence of Childebert and the earlier Merovingians. Count Eudes (king A.D. 888) reconstructed the old Palais de la Cité as a fortress against the Norman invaders. When the Louvre was built by Philip Augustus, the palais lost its importance as a fortress and as it became a residence and the seat of royal courts of justice, a use to which the entire building was finally put. The present façade is comparatively modern, and all has been restored since the wanton destruction by the Commune. The Salle des Pas Perdus is a splendid vaulted hall, 240 by 90 feet, with a central range of columns. The Galerie de St. Louis is admirably frescoed by Merson, and many other halls are notable for their decoration. The modern west façade is impressive; it is in a neoclassical style with 8 great Doric columns and 2 antepiers, and much sculpture; it opens on a magnificent vestibule.

Palais du Trocadéro (dü trō-kä-dā'rō). A long building in Paris, constructed in connection with the exhibition of 1878, and combining several museums and a large concert-hall. The latter occupies a central pavilion of horseshoe shape 100 feet in diameter and 185 feet high, flanked by towers 250 feet high. From each side extends a low curved wing 660 feet long, the plan of the whole thus being a crescent. The entire wing front is skirted by continuous open galleries.

Palais Royal (rwa-yal'). A palace in Paris, built by Richelieu 1629–34, and left by him to the king. It was given by Louis XIV. to the Duke of Orleans, and remained in his family, with interruptions during the Revolution and the empire, until the revolution of 1848. It was damaged by the Commune in 1871, but has been restored. The state apartments are handsome. The gardens were surrounded by the duke Philippe Egalité with houses and galleries (still used for purposes of trade), and the southwest angle is occupied by the Théâtre Français.

Palamas (pal'a-mas). Gregorius. Lived about 1350. A Greek archbishop of Thessalonica, leader of the Hesychasts.

Palamedes (pal-a-mē'dēz). [Gr. Παλαμήδης.] In Greek legend, son of Nauplius and Clymene, one of the Greek warriors in the expedition against Troy. He was killed through the machinations of Odysseus.

Palamites (pal'a-mits). The followers of Gregorius Palamas, a monk of Mount Athos in the 14th century. Simeon, abbot of a monastery at Constantinople in the 11th century, taught that by fasting, prayer, and contemplation, with concentration of thought on the navel, the heart and spirit would be seen within, luminous with a visible light. This light was believed to be uncreated, and the same which was seen at Christ's transfiguration, and is known accordingly as the "uncreated light of Mount Tabor." The doctrine was vigorously formulated and defended by Palamas, who taught that there exists a divine light, eternal and uncreated, which is not the substance or essence of God, but God's activity or operation. The Palamites were favored by the emperor Joannes Cantacuzenus, and their doctrine was confirmed by a council at Constantinople in 1351. They were called by their opponents Euchites and Massalians: also Hesychasts and Umbilicanimi.

Palamon and Arcite (pal'a-mon and är'sīt). Two noble youths the story of whose love for Emilia has been told by Chaucer in the "Knight's Tale" (derived from Boccaccio's "Teseide"), by Dryden in a version of "The Knight's Tale" called "Palamon and Arcite," by Fletcher and another (perhaps Shakspere) in a play called "The Two Noble Kinsmen" (1634), and by others. Edwards produced a play entitled "Palamon and Arcite" at Christ Church hall, Oxford, 1566, in honor of Queen Elizabeth's visit there; and a play with the same name is mentioned by Henslowe in 1594.

Palanpur, or Pahlanpur (pä-lan-pör'). 1. A native state in India, under British protection, intersected by lat. 24° 20′ N., long. 72° 20′ E.— 2. The capital of the state of Palanpur. Population (1881), 17,547.

Palaprat (pä-lä-prä'), Jean, Sieur de Bigot. Born at Toulouse, France, 1650; died at Paris, Oct. 14, 1721. A French dramatist, collaborator with Brueys.

The collaboration of Brueys and Palaprat resulte d in the modern version of the famous mediæval farce "L'Avocat Patelin," and in an excellent piece of the Molière Regnard type, "Le Grondeur." Somewhat plays of less merit were written by the friends, while each is responsible for two independent pieces. Both were Provençals, David Augustin de Brueys having been born at Aix in 1640, Jean Palaprat at Toulouse 10 years later. Brueys, who, as an abbé converted by Bossuet and engaged actively in propagating his new faith, had some difficulty in appearing publicly as a dramatic author, is understood to have had the chief share in the composition of the joint dramas.

Palatinate (pa-lat'i-nāt), The. [F. Palatinat, G. Pfalz, ML. Palatinatus, the province of a count palatine, from palatinus, palatine.] A former German state, sometimes divided into two, and often connected with Bavaria. The palsgraves of the Rhine, whose earliest seat was at Aix-la-Chapelle, were important princes of the empire as early as the 11th century. The Palatinate fell to Bavaria in 1214; it was separated from it in 1329, part of Bavaria (Upper Palatinate) being united to it; and the electorate passed alternately from Bavaria to the Palatinate. In 1356 the electorate was given definitely to the Palatinate. The Reformation was introduced in the 16th century. The elector Frederick V. ("The Winter King") accepted the Bohemian crown in 1619, and was dethroned in 1620. The Lower or Rhine Palatinate (the capital of which was Heidelberg) and the electoral dignity were given to Bavaria in 1623. The Upper Palatinate was also given to Bavaria in 1628. By the treaty of 1648 the Rhine Palatinate was restored to its former rulers, and an eighth electorate created for it, the Upper Palatinate being confirmed to Bavaria. The Rhine Palatinate was ravaged by the French in 1674–79 and 1689. The Palatinate and the Bavarian lands were united in 1777. In 1801 the Rhine Palatinate was divided: all west of the Rhine was ceded to France, and the rest fell to Hesse-Darmstadt, Nassau, etc. By the treaties of 1814–15 the French portion of the Rhine Palatinate was given to Germany: Prussia and Hesse-Darmstadt received portions, but the greater portion fell to Bavaria. This part is the present Rhine Palatinate, or Lower Palatinate (G. Rheinpfalz or Unterpfalz). It is bounded by Prussia on the east, and borders on Hesse, Prussia, and Alsace-Lorraine. It forms a "Regierungsbezirk" of Bavaria, with spurs as capital. It is traversed by the Haardt Mountains, and produces grain, wine, coal, etc. Area, 2,289 square miles. Population (1890), 728,339. The Upper Palatinate (G. Oberpfalz) forms a Bavarian circle, and Bavaria gives the title Upper Palatinate and Regensburg. It borders on Bohemia. Capital, Ratisbon. It has extensive forests and flourishing industries. Area, 3,729 square miles. Population (1890), 557,760.

Palatine (pal'a-tīn) Hill. [L. Mons Palatinus, It. Monte Palatino.] One of the "seven hills" of Rome, situated southeast of the Capitoline and north-northeast of the Aventine. It borders on the Roman Forum; is the traditional seat of the city founded by Romulus; was the seat of private and later of imperial residences; and contains many antiquities.

Palatka (pa-lat'kā). A city, the capital of Putnam County, Florida, situated on St. John's River. Population (1890), 3,699.

Palawan (pä-lä-wän'), or Paragua (pä-rä'gwä). An island in the Malay Archipelago, lying between Borneo and the main group of the Philippine Islands. It belongs partly to the Philippines and partly to the Sultan of the Sulu Islands. Area, 4,576 square miles. Population, estimated, about 50,000.

Palazzolo Acreide (pä-lät'sō-lō äk-rā'ē-de). A town in the province of Syracuse, Sicily, 19 miles west of Syracuse: on the site of the ancient Acræ. It contains many antiquities, including a Greek theater and burial-ground. The theater is small but very perfect. There are 12 tiers of seats, divided into 9 cunei by radial stairways. Parts of the stage structure remain. Population (1881), 13,021.

Palazzolo sull' Oglio (pä-lät'sō-lō sōl ōl'yō). A small town in the province of Brescia, Italy, situated on the Oglio 35 miles east-northeast of Milan.

Palazzo Pitti (pēt'tē). A palace in Florence, Italy, designed by Brunelleschi, and begun about 1435. The massive building of the chief façade is of quarry-faced ashlar in three stories with series of round-arched windows having very long voussoirs. The front toward the Boboli Gardens has projecting wings inclosing a court, with pressed tiers of pilasters formed of blocks alternately large and small. It is at once a royal palace and the home of a world-famous gallery of paintings.

Palazzo Pubblico. See Siena.

Palazzo Valentino. See Turin.

Palazzo Vecchio (pä-lät'sō vek'kē-ō). [It., 'old palace.'] A palace in Florence, built in 1298 by Arnolfo as the official seat of the chief magistrates of Florence. It is an imposing castellike building, with small windows, a heavy projecting machicolated and battlemented gallery above, and a great square tower rising from it, also having a machicolated gallery, and supporting a belfry resting on 4 cylindrical columns. The total height is 307 feet. The quincuncial interior court has 9 rich Renaissance columns carved in arabesques. The apartments are extremely interesting, displaying fine coffered ceilings, historical paintings, and sculptures.

Pale (pāl), The English. That part of Ireland in which English law was acknowledged, and within which the dominion of the English was restricted, for some centuries after the conquests of Henry II. John distributed the part of Ireland then subject to England into 12 counties palatine, and this region became subsequently known as the Pale, but the limits varied at different times.

Paleario (pä-lā-ä'rē-ō), or della Paglia (del' lä päl'yä), or degli Pagliaricci (del'yē päl-yä-ret'chē), Aonio or Antonio. Born at Veroli, Italy, about 1500; executed at Rome, July, 1570. An Italian Reformer and humanist, arrested by the Inquisition on a charge of heresy, and executed. He published theological works, a didactic poem in Latin, etc.

Palembang (pä-lem-bäng'). 1. A residency in the southeastern part of Sumatra, Dutch East Indies. It corresponds in the main to the former kingdom of Palembang and the kingdom of Jambi. Population (1890), 655,825.— 2. The capital of Palembang, situated on the river Musi in lat. 2° 59′ S., long. 104° 45′ E. It was taken by the Dutch in 1821. Population, about 50,000.

Palencia (pä-lān'thē-ä). 1. A province in Old Castile, Spain, bounded by Santander on the north, Burgos on the east, Valladolid on the south, and Valladolid and Leon on the west. It is mountainous in the north and a plateau in the south. Area, 3,264 square miles. Population (1887), 188,864.— 2. The capital of the province of Palencia, situated on the Carrion in lat. 42° N., long. 4° 29′ W.: the ancient Pallantia. It has linen and other manufactures. The first Spanish university, founded here about 1209, was removed to Salamanca in 1238. It has a cathedral, chiefly of the 14th century. Population (1887), 15,028.

Palencia, Diego Fernandez de. See Fernandez de Palencia.

Palenque (pä-lān'kā). [So called from a neighboring modern village.] A group of ruined buildings in the state of Chiapas, Mexico, about 60 miles north-northeast of San Cristobal. They are of calcareous stone, and consist of a large central building commonly called the "palace," with various smaller buildings, pyramids, etc. Hieroglyphic tablets and two sculptured figures of great interest have been discovered. The Palenque ruins were unknown to the Spaniards until the middle of the 18th century, and it is evident that the place had been deserted long before the white conquest. It is conjectured that the buildings were used for religious purposes.

Palenques (pä-lān'kās), or Palencas (pä-lān'käs). Indians of northern Venezuela, in the western part of what is now the state of Bermudez. As a tribe they are extinct. They belonged to the Carib linguistic stock.

Palenque tablet. A stone plate, covered with hieroglyphics, which was sent to the Smithsonian Institution in 1842, and is now in the National Museum at Washington. It was found at Palenque, Mexico, where it originally formed the left side of the Group of the Cross, a remarkable ornament on one of the temples. This group was 6½ feet high by about 12 broad; the central portion exhibited a cross-like structure with a human figure on each side and other details; flanking it were two slabs with closely set hieroglyphic characters: of those the Palenque tablet is one. Various attempts have been made to decipher the characters.

Palermo. A province in Sicily. Area, 1,948 square miles. Population (1891), 791,928.

Palermo (pä-lėr'mō; It. pron. pä-ler'mō). [It. Palermo, L. Panormus, Panhormus, Gr. Πανορμος.] The capital of the province of Palermo, Sicily, a seaport situated on the Bay of Palermo, at the foot of Monte Pellegrino, in lat. 38° 7′ N., long. 13° 21′ E.: the ancient Panormus. It is the largest city and the commercial center of Sicily, and the fifth city of Italy; is the seat of extensive trade and industries, exporting oranges, lemons, sulphur, wine, sumac, etc.; and has manufactures of silk, cotton, etc. The cathedral is a large and highly picturesque Norman-Saracenic building. The exterior is flanked by 2 slender towers, and enriched with graceful arcades and Saracene battlements. The south porch incloses a sculptured portal; the arcaded west front has 3 recessed portals, and is connected by flying arches with a free-standing campanile; the interlacing arcades and arabesque patterns of the chevet are unique in architecture. The interior is modernized, but contains many monuments of considerable interest. Henry VI. and Frederick II., kings, and archbishops. The Ponte dell' Ammiraglio, a picturesque Saracenic bridge built across the river (which has since changed its course) in 1113 by King Roger's Greek admiral, rises toward the middle in gable form, and consists of 11 pointed arches so disposed that those of unequal span alternate. San Giovanni degli Eremiti, a notable foundation of King Roger (1132), of T-plan with 3 shallow apses, is roofed by 5 domes supported on squinches, and possesses a quadrangular cloistered tower and belfry. Palermo was founded apparently by the Phœnicians, and was one of the strongholds of Carthage. It was taken by Pyrrhus in 276 B. C., and passed from Carthage to Rome in 254 B. C. The Carthaginians under Hasdrubal were defeated under its walls by the Romans under Cæcilius Metellus in 251 or 250. It was taken by the Vandals and Genseric in 440 A. D.; was captured by Belisarius in 535; was taken by the Saracens about 830, and became one of their chief cities; later became the capital of Sicily; was captured by the Normans about 1072; passed to the Germans and to the house of Anjou; was the scene of the Sicilian Vespers in 1282, and came under the rule of Spain; followed the later fortunes of Sicily; was the scene of an insurrection in 1820, and the seat of a revolutionary government in 1848–49; was bombarded and relieved by the Bourbons in 1849; and revolted, receiving the troops of Garibaldi in 1860. Population (1892), 273,000.

The thing to be borne in mind in the early history of Palermo is an idea that it never was, as the other great cities of Sicily were, a commonwealth of republican and pagan Hellas; nor did it ever fall into the hands of any tyrant of Hellenic Sicily . . . Palermo, as it now stands, in the actual date of its streets, its churches, its palaces, carries us back to no date earlier than the days of the Norman counts and kings. Freeman, Hist. Essays, III. 438, 441.

Palermo, Gulf of. A bay of the Mediterranean Sea, near Palermo.

Pales (pā'lēz). 1. In old Italian mythology, a deity, protector of shepherds and flocks.—2. An asteroid (No. 49) discovered by Goldschmidt at Paris, Sept. 19, 1857.

Palestine (pal'es-tīn), called also Canaan (kā'nan) and The Holy Land. [L. Palæstina, Palæstine, Gr. Παλαιστίνη, the country of the Philistines. See Philistines.] The country of the Hebrews, a territory in the southern part of Syria. Chief city, Jerusalem. The name is occasionally restricted to the coast region of the Philistines, but is usually regarded as indicating the region bounded by the Mediterranean on the west and the desert on the east, and on the south by an indefinite line running westward from the southern extremity of the Dead Sea. On the north it is regarded as bounded (somewhat indefinitely) by the region of Phenicia, Lebanon, and Anti-Lebanon. The chief natural features are the plain bordering on the Mediterranean, the mountainous mass extending eastward to the Jordan, the deeply sunken valley of the Jordan (with the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea), and the elevated region lying east of the Jordan. The soil is naturally fertile. The ancient inhabitants were the Canaanites, who were later conquered and more or less assimilated with the Israelites, under whom the country was portioned out in the tribal divisions of Simeon, Judah, Dan, Benjamin, Ephraim, Manasseh, Asher, Issachar, Zebulun, Naphtali, Gad, and Reuben. The divisions west of the Jordan in the time of Christ were Judea in the south, Samaria in the center, and Galilee in the north. The country, after being subject for a time to the Romans, passed under the Mohammedan rule; was held by the Christians temporarily during the Crusades; and since 1516–17 has been in the possession of the Turkish government. Area, estimated, 10,000–11,000 square miles. Population, probably about 400,000.

Palestine. A city, the capital of Anderson County, southern Texas. Population (1890), 5,834.

Palestrina (pä-les-trē'nä). A town in the province of Rome, Italy, 22 miles east of Rome: the ancient Præneste (which see). It contains a cathedral and many antiquities. The sanctuary of Fortune is a very ancient foundation of wealth and renown, which occupied ten terraces rising in succession and now in part covered by the modern city. The chief remains, besides the terrace walls, include the main temple surviving almost complete with Corinthian columns and pilasters and a raised tribune, the grotto of the famous oracle, mosaics, extensive ruins of vaulted chambers and porticos, and a small circular temple, now disposed as a chapel, at the summit. It was the birthplace of Palestrina. Population (1881), 6,000.

Palestrina, Giovanni Pierluigi da. Born at Palestrina, near Rome, probably 1524: died at Rome, Feb. 2, 1594. A celebrated Italian musician, surnamed "Princeps Musicæ" ("Prince of Music"). He was chapel-master at the Lateran, Vatican, and St. Maria Maggiore in Rome. In accordance with regulations of the Council of Trent, he composed three masses in 1565, setting the standard of ecclesiastical music. For this he was appointed composer to the pontifical choir. He is considered the first composer who handled the art with the science of music, and his works, all sacred except two volumes of madrigals, mark an important epoch in the annals of music. He left between 90 and 100 masses, hymns for the year, about 60 motets, and a number of lamentations, litanies, etc.

Palissy (pä-lē-sē'), Bernard. Born at Chapelle Biron, near Agen, probably about 1510: died in the Bastille, Paris, 1589. A celebrated French potter and enameler. He received an imperfect education, but acquired himself designing, civil engineering, and natural history, and made several journeys in France and Germany: he also made some of the earliest investigations in geology. In 1539 he established himself at Saintes, where he married and practised the business of surveying. In 1553 he chanced to see a glazed cup which suggested experiments in glazing, and, after long trying, only a white enamel, and for some time failed in his attempts, but at length succeeded. He then tried to produce the various colors of nature. For 16 years he labored in extreme poverty before he succeeded in making the ware in high relief and rustic figulines associated with his name. He embraced the reformed religion, and was one of the principal leaders of the Calvinistic church at Saintes. In 1562 his atelier was raided and devastated as a place of politico-religious meetings. He was arrested and imprisoned at Bordeaux, but was saved from the lot of his corelegionists by the Connétable de Montmorency, who interceded with the queen, Catharine de' Medici. Set at liberty, Palissy attached himself to the king, the queen mother Catharine, and the Constable de Montmorency. The connétable brought Palissy to Paris, where he set up his furnaces in the tile-yards (guileries), where the Palais des Tuileries was built. Four of his furnaces have recently been discovered under the palace. He was also employed at Écouen. In 1566 he was charged by Catharine with the construction of grottoes and other works in the Tuileries gardens. He was engaged in this work in 1572 when the massacre of St. Bartholomew occurred. His life was saved by the protection of Queen Catharine herself. In 1573 he opened a course of lectures in natural history, and continued this until 1584. He was among the very first to substitute positive experiment for the explanations of the schoolmen. He also investigated the geology of the Paris basin, and formed the first cabinet of natural history in France. In 1588 he was arrested and thrown into the Bastille, and died there. His writings were published between 1557 and 1580.

Palitana (pä-lē-tä'nä). 1. A small state in India, under British influence, intersected by lat. 21° 30′ N., long. 71° 45′ E. Population (1881), 49,271.—2. A city of temples in the state of Palitana, one of the remarkable Jain agglomerations which consist wholly of temples and have no inhabitants except a few priests and servants. It covers a large area, including two hills, surrounded by picturesque fortifications and numbering hundreds of temples, the largest of which stand in their own inclosures. All the temples are characterized by their pagodalowers, here in general quadrangular steeply pyramidal with bulging sides, and having a bulbous amalaka crowning. The construction is excellent, and much of the finish and ornament admirable. The earliest temple extant is from the 12th century, and these sanctuaries, always of the same type, to the present day. Also called Satrunjaya.

Pallas (pal'as). [Gr. Παλλάς, originally only a surname of Athene: probably from πάλλω, virgin.] 1. Athene, the goddess of wisdom and war among the Greeks: identified by the Romans with Minerva. See Athene and Minerva.—2. One of the planetoids revolving between the orbits of Mars and Jupiter, discovered (the second in the order of time) by Olbers at Bremen, March 28, 1802. On account of its eminence and the indebtedness by which it is surrounded, no apology can be needed for here inserting its magnitude. Its diameter has been estimated at 304 miles, and its period of revolution at 1 64 years. Its light undergoes considerable variation, and its motion, in consequence, is greatly disturbed by the powerful attraction of Jupiter.

Pallas (pal'las), Peter Simon. Born at Berlin, 1741: died there, Sept. 8, 1811. A German naturalist and traveler. He made a journey through Russia and Siberia 1768–74, described in "Reisen durch verschiedene Provinzen des Russischen Reichs" (3 vols.), "Journeys through different Provinces of the Russian Realm" (1771–76). He also wrote "Spicilegia Zoologica" (1767–1804), "Flora Rossica" (1784–88), "Sammlungen historischer Nachrichten über die mongolischen Völkerschaften" ("Collections of Historical Information on the Mongolian Races," 1776–1802), and various scientific works.

Pall Mall (pel mel'). A fine street in London, leading from Trafalgar Square to the Green Park; between Cockspur street and Trafalgar Square it is called Pall Mall East.

Its name is a record of its having been the place where the game of Pall-mall or pell-mell — a game still popular in the deserted streets of old sleepy Italian cities, and deriving its name from Palla, a ball, and Maglia a mallet. The street was not enclosed till about 1660, when it was at first called Catherine-street in honor of Catherine of Braganza, and it still continued to be a fashionable promenade. Club-houses are the characteristic of the street, though none of the existing buildings date beyond the 19th century. In the 18th century their place was filled by taverns where various literary and convivial societies had their meetings. Hotz, London, II. 44.

Palmyra (pal-mī'rä), or Tadmor (tad'mōr). [Gr. Παλμύρα.] In ancient geography, a city situated in the oasis in the Syrian desert, about lat. 34° 18′ N., long. 38° 30′ E.: said to have been built by Solomon. It early became an important commercial center; rose to prominence in the reigns Hadrian (about 130 A. D.); became a Roman colony about 212; became practically independent in the reign of Valerian in Gallienus under Odenathus, and was the capital of the important kingdom of Palmyra. It became virtually independent under Zenobia, who was defeated and captured by Aurelian in 272. Palmyra was destroyed in 273. Later it was rebuilt, and is now in ruins. Palmyra became celebrated for its extensive architectural remains, which date for the most part from near the close of the Roman protectorate, and are more rich than pure in style. The chief monument is the temple of the Sun, with its impressive inclosure. Almost more striking are the long double lines of colonnaded streets, spanned by triumphal arches. There are many other ruins, including temples, public buildings, dwellings, and long stretches of towered fortifications of the time of Justinian. There is also an extensive necropolis, characterized by mausoleums in the form of towers. Only the more prominent remains have been thoroughly studied.

This latter year he went abroad to travel in Germany, France, Switzerland, and Italy. Subsequent works are the dramatic poems "Venus" (1841), "Dryadens Bryllup" ("The Dryad's Wedding"), and "Ithon" ("Ithonus"), both 1844. His great work, "Adam Homo," written in ottava rima, appeared from 1847 to 1848. Among his other works are "Abels Død" ("Abel's Death," 1854), the lyric drama "Kalanus" (1855), "Paradiset" ("Paradise," 1861), "Kain" ("Cain"), "Ahasverus" ("Ahasuerus"), "Benedict fra Nursia." A comedy "Tiderne Skifte" ("The Times Change"), and the lyric poem "Adonis" are both from 1874. He is also the author of two prose works: the allegorical tale "Ung-dömskilden" ("The Fountain of Youth," 1865) and the social novel, in 3 volumes, "Ivar Lykkes Historie" ("The History of Ivar Lykke," 1866–70). His poetical writings ("Poetiske Skrifter") appeared at Copenhagen, 1878–79, in 8 volumes.

Palwal, or Pulwul (pul-wul'), a town in Gurgaon district, Punjab, British India, 40 miles south of Delhi. Population (1881), 10,635.

Pam, a nickname familiarly given to Viscount Palmerston.

Pamas. See Purupurus.

Pamayrs. See Purupurus.

Pamela (pa-mē'lā). The daughter of Basilius and sister of Philoclea: a noted character in Sidney's romance "Arcadia." Richardson gave the name to a servant, to signify that fine feelings were not confined to the upper classes.

Pamela (pam'ē-lā), or Virtue Rewarded. The first of the series of novels written by Samuel Richardson, published in 1740. It is so called from the name of the heroine, an ostentatiously virtuous servant who resists the dishonorable attempts of her master, and is finally rewarded by becoming his wife. This amused Fielding and provoked him into writing the history of Joseph Andrews, "an equally virtuous servingman and the brother of Pamela, which was begun as a caricature, but grew into a work of independent character. Pope, in a letter to Mrs. Blount," accents the name Pame'la (but see the extract).

One significant sign of its [Pamela's] popularity was its changing the pronunciation of the name itself, which in Pope is accented on the second syllable, and in Richardson on the first,—the public being willing to introduce discord into a line of the former, rather than spoil the harmony of a few verses which the latter had inserted in the novel. Whipple, Essays.

Pames (pä'mās), or Pamis (pä'mēs). Mexican Indians in the southeastern part of the state of San Luis Potosí and the adjacent parts of Querétaro and Guanajuato. They are of Otomi stock, closely related to the true Otomis, and have long been partially civilized. See Otomis and Otomi stock.

Pamiers (pä-myā'). A cathedral city in the department of Ariège, France, situated on the Ariège 40 miles south of Toulouse. It was the capital of the former countship of Foix. It was sacked in 1628. Population (1891), commune, 11,143.

Pamir (pä-mēr'). The name given to an extensive plateau region in central Asia, northeast of Afghanistan, south Asiatic Russia, and west of East Turkestan. It contains the sources of the Amu-Daria. Its elevation is about 13,000 feet, and some peaks reach 25,000 feet. It is on the borders of the Russian, Chinese, and British empires, and hence has recently become of great interest. Of the Pamirs, the Little Pamir is north of Hunza, the Great Pamir northwest of this, while other Pamirs are the Taghdumbash, Alichur Pamir, etc.

Pamlico (pam-lē'kō). [Pl., also Pamlicos.] A tribe of North American Indians living upon the river of the same name in Beaufort County, North Carolina. They were nearly destroyed by small-pox in 1696 and by the Tuscarora war of 1711, the remnant of them being absorbed in the Tuscarora tribe. See Algonquian.

Pamlico (pam'li-kō) River. The estuary of the Tar River, North Carolina, communicating with Pamlico Sound.

Pamlico Sound. An arm of the Atlantic east of North Carolina, separated from the Atlantic by low narrow islands. It communicates with Albemarle Sound on the north by Croatan and Roanoke sounds, and with the Atlantic by Ocracoke, Hatteras, and other inlets. Length, about 75 miles.

Pammanas, or Pammarys. See Purupurus.

Pampa (pām'pä). A territory of the Argentine Republic, west of Buenos Ayres. Area variously estimated at from 58,000 to 89,000 square miles. Population (1890), 38,500.

Pampa Aullagas (pām'pä oul-yā'gäs), or Aullagas, called also Poopo (pō-ō-pō'), etc. A swampy lake in Bolivia which receives the river Desaguadero from Lake Titicaca. It has no outlet. Length, 65–70 miles.

Pampas (pām'päs). A name given in the Argentine Republic to various Indian tribes inhabiting the pampas to the south and west of Buenos Ayres, especially the Puelches, Ranqueliches, and Pehuenches.

Pampas (pam'pas, sp. pron. pām'päs). [Said to be from a Quichua word meaning 'an open field.'] A name given in southern and western South America to various open and grassy plains, and in this sense synonymous with Llanos. Specifically, and in a geographical sense, the pampas are the great open plains of the Argentine Republic, between the river Paraná and the Atlantic on the east and the mountainous regions of the west. Northward these plains are continuous with the Gran Chaco, and southward they rise into the table lands of Patagonia. Regarding the river Salado as the northern boundary, and the Colorado as the southern, the pampas embrace the provinces of Buenos Ayres and South Fe, most of Cordoba, portions of Santiago, San Luis, and Mendoza, and the territory of La Pampa, to which the name is now commonly restricted in Argentina. This gives an area of over 300,000 square miles. The elevation in Cordoba is 1,200 or 1,300 feet; thence it falls regularly southeastward to 40 or 50 feet near the Atlantic. There are occasional depressions, occupied by salines, but no high hills. The surface is everywhere open and, where not too dry, very fertile, portions are subject to floods. The name is often extended, especially by naturalists, to the open but hilly lands east of the Paraná and in Uruguay and southern Brazil.

Pampas del Sacramento (pām'pas del säk-rä-mān'tō). A region of northern Peru, between the rivers Huallaga and Ucayale. From the little known of it, it appears to be a plateau varied with hills or low mountains, very fertile, and on a healthy and agreeable climate, much of the surface is free from forest. It was discovered and named by the Jesuit Simon Zita in 1732, and for many years was the seat of flourishing Jesuit missions. There are now few inhabitants except wandering Indians. Length, probably 500 miles. Width 40 to 100 miles.

Pampean (pam'pē-an) race. [F. race pampéenne.] A name under which D'Orbigny (1839) included nearly all the South American Indian tribes known to him east of the Andes, except those of the Tupi and Tapuya stocks. He divided them into 3 races—the Pampean, Chiquitean, and Moxean. This classification was based on physical characteristics, and later ethnologists, relying mainly on the differences of language, have abandoned it. The tribes are now distributed in many linguistic stocks.

Pampean stock, or Araucanian stock (ou-kā'nē-an stok), or Araucanian (ā-rou-kā'nē-an) stock. A linguistic stock of South American Indians, on both sides of the Andes, in southern Chile and the Argentine Republic. It embraces among other tribes the Araucanians of Chile, and the Araucano-Pampas, Puelches, and Querandis of the Argentine. They are all known as valiant warriors who long resisted the Spaniards; most of them are still practically independent.

Pamplona. See Pamplona.

Pamphylia (pam-fil'i-ä). [Gr. Παμφυλία, country of all tribes.] In ancient geography, a mountainous region in Asia Minor, bounded by Pisidia on the north, Cilicia on the east, the Mediterranean on the south, and Lycia on the west. It was successively under the rule of Lydia, Persia, Macedon, Syria, Pergamus, and Rome.

Pamphylian (pam-fil'i-an) Gulf, or Pamphylian Sea. The ancient name of the Gulf of Adalia.

Pamplona (päm-plō'nä), or Pampeluna (päm-pā-lö'nä), F. Pampelune (pōnp-lün'). 1. A province of Spain. See Navarre.—2. The capital of the province, situated on the Arga about lat. 42° 50′ N., long. 1° 43′ W. It is a fortress and strategic point of importance. The cathedral dates from 1397, with a modernized west front. The cloister is of excellent ecclesiastical Pointed work, in part with openwork pediments over the traceried arches. A refectory and several rooms and chapels older than the cathedral open on the cloister. Pamplona was an ancient town of the Vascones: was partially destroyed by Charles the Great in 778; suffered in the Moorish wars; became the capital of the kingdom of Navarre; was taken by the French in 1808, and retaken by the Spaniards in 1813; and suffered in the Carlist wars. Population (1887), 26,663.

Pamplona (päm-plō'nä). A town in the department of Santander, Colombia, 205 miles north-northeast of Bogotá. Population, about 6,000.

Pamunkey (pa-mungk'i). A river in Virginia, formed by the union of the North and South Anna, and uniting with the Mattapony at West Point to form the York River. Length, with the South Anna, over 100 miles.

Pan (pan). [Gr. Πάν.] In ancient Greek mythology, the god of pastures, forests, and flocks. The original seat of his worship was in Arcadia, whence it gradually spread over the rest of Greece. He was represented with the head and body of an elderly man, while his lower parts were like the hind quarters of a goat, of which animal he bore the horns and ears also. He was fond of music and of dancing with the forest nymphs, and was the inventor of the syrinx, or shepherd's flute. Hence arose the pipes of Pan (Panpipes, panpipe), something without visible or reasonable cause was attributed to his influence. The Romans identified the Greek Pan with their own god Faunus, and sometimes also with Faunus.

Panack. See Bonnack.

Panætius (pa-nē'shi-us). [Gr. Παναίτιος.] Born about 180 B. C.; died about 111 B. C. A Greek Stoic philosopher of Rhodes, the friend (at Rome) of Lælius and Scipio the Younger.

Panagia (pa-naj'i-ä). [Gr. Παναγία, all-holy.] In the Greek or Orthodox Eastern Church, a title of the Virgin Mary. This title signifies literally 'all-holy,' an intensive of the epithet "holy" applied to other saints, and is of all her titles that which is in most general use.

Panama (pā-nä-mä'). 1. A department of Colombia, comprising (merely) the Isthmus of Panama, and bordering on Costa Rica. It was independent 1859–61. Area, 31,571 square miles. Population, 285,000.—2. A cathedral city and seaport, capital of the department of Panama, situated on the Bay of Panama in lat. 8° 57′ N., long. 79° 32′ W. It is the seat of a large export and transit trade, the terminus of the Panama Railway, and a free port. It was founded in 1519 by Pedrarias, burned by Morgan's buccaneers in 1671, and rebuilt in its present location in 1673. Population, about 25,000.

Panama, Audience of. A Spanish court and governing body located at Panama. As originally established in 1538 by decree of Isabella it had all the Spanish possessions on the Caribbean and South American coast except Venezuela. It was suppressed in 1543, on the creation of the audiences of Lima and Guatemala. From 1563 to 1567 the audience of Guatemala was removed to Panama, with jurisdiction over Honduras, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Isthmus, and most of New Granada, after the latter year, Honduras, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica were attached to the audience of Guatemala, that of Panama including the Isthmus and New Granada subject to the audience of Lima. It was suppressed from 1718 to 1724, and subsequently, until its final suppression in 1751, were subordinate to the audience of New Granada at Bogotá.

Panama, Bay of. An arm of the Pacific Ocean, south of the Isthmus of Panama.

Panama, Isthmus of, or Isthmus of Darien. An isthmus, forming a part of Colombia, which connects North and South America and separates the Caribbean Sea from the Pacific Ocean. It is traversed by low mountains. Length (to Costa Rica), about 500 miles. Width, 50–70 miles. The name Panama is sometimes used in a more restricted sense for a narrow portion of the isthmus immediately opposite the town of Panama, and a similar construction opposite the Gulf of Darien is often distinguished as the Isthmus of Darien.

Panama Canal. A projected ship-canal across the Isthmus of Panama. The idea of piercing the isthmus is very old, and from 1828 many surveys were made with reference to it, including very complete ones by the United States engineers in 1850–75. In 1877 the Colombian government granted a concession to a Frenchman named Wyse for constructing the canal. Ferdinand de Lesseps supported the scheme, and in an international "international scientific congress" met at Paris in May, 1879, and after a short session, and without considering other plans, decided in favor of the Panama route. The American delegates refrained from voting. A Panama canal company was at once formed; the Wyse concession was purchased by it; De Lesseps himself, as chief engineer, visited the isthmus and declared that the canal was entirely practicable; and an "international technical committee" estimated the cost at $168,000,000. On the strength of these representations the shares were rapidly taken, and active work was commenced in 1881. The route decided upon is close to the Panama Railroad, crossing the Chagres River six times, and following, for long and deep cut through the Central Cordillera; the periodical floods of the Chagres were to be controlled by dams. Work was continued, with some interruptions, until March, 1889, when the company went into liquidation. Up to that time it is said to have absorbed $200,000,000, obtained by the sale of shares and bonds, mainly to the middle classes in France; and finally by lottery drawings, which were authorized by the French government. Of the total length of the canal (54 miles), 12 miles had been so far finished as to be navigable; but in the remainder the most difficult portions. In Dec., 1892, De Lesseps and his son, the contractor Eiffel, and others were arrested on charges of fraud in connection with the canal. At their trial it was shown that a large portion of the funds had been used in bribing the French press and in bribing members of the French parliament, etc. Owing to these revelations several well-known men were forced from public life. See Lesseps, Ferdinand de.

Panama Congress. A congress held at Panama in 1826 for the settlement of various matters pertaining to America in general. Several Spanish-American countries and the United States were represented. The results were unimportant.

Panama Railway. A railway across the Isthmus of Panama, connecting Panama with Aspinwall. It is owned by an American company, and was commenced in 1850 and completed in 1855. Length, 47 miles.

Pan-American Congress. A congress of representatives from the United States, Mexico, Haiti, and all the states of Central America and South America, held at Washington 1889–1890, for the purpose of consultation on matters common to the various states, and for the furtherance of international commerce and comity.

Pananas (pā-nā-nās'). [Corruption of Panocas.] The name given in New Mexico by the Spanish settlers to the Pawnee tribe.

Panaro (pā-nā'rō). A river of Italy, which joins the Po 12 miles northwest of Ferrara. Length, about 75 miles.

Panasht. See Bannock.

Panathenaic Stadium. See Athens.

Panay (pā-nī'). One of the Philippine Islands, situated southeast of Mindoro and northwest of Negros. Area, 4,633 square miles.

Panchala (pan-chā'lä). The name of a country and people of ancient India in the Mahabharata in the Lower Doab; in Manu, near Kanauj; and according to Wilson, "extending north and west from Delhi, from the foot of the Himalayas to the Chambal"). They were divided into Northern and Southern Panchalas, the Ganges separating them.

Panchatantra (pan-cha-tan'tra). [Skt., "having five divisions or books."] A celebrated Sanskrit book of fables, one of the two sources of the Hitopadesha (which see), 25 of the 43 fables of the latter being found in it. From a now lost earlier Indian original of the Panchatantra came a lost Pahlavi translation about 550 A. D.; from that the Syriac "Kalilag and Damnag" (570) and the Arabic "Kalilah and Dimnah" (750); from the Arabic, the unknown Hebrew diary of Rabbi's "Alter Æsopus" of the 12th century; the Latin intermediary of Don Alfonso's Spanish version of 1239; the Hebrew of Rabbi Joel of 1250; the Persian of Nasr Allah 1150, and the Greek of Symeon Seth, 1080; from Rabbi Joel's Hebrew version, John of Capua's "Directorium humanæ vitæ" 1270, a Spanish version ("Exemplario") in 1493, an Italian by Doni in 15 —, and from that again the English of Sir Thomas North of 1570, while from Rabbi Joel's Hebrew through John of Capua's "Directorium" came also Duke Eberhard's "Buch der Beispiele" of 1480: from the Persian of Nasr Allah 1150 came Abul Fazl's revision for Akbar of 1596, and thence Turkish rendered into French, and the "Anwari Suhaili," or "Lights of Canopus," translated into English by Eastwick 1854; from the Greek of Symeon Seth 1080 came a Latin version, published in Rome 1666, and an Italian published at Ferrara 1583. This tabulation by Iannaci of the results of Benfey, given by him in the introduction to his Panchatantra (Leipsic, 1859), and in Benfey's introduction to Bickell's "Kalilag und Damnag" (Leipsic, 1876), shows the importance of the work in the history of folk-lore. It is the origin of the fables known throughout Europe as those of Pilpay or Bidpai. (See Pilpay.) Besides the German version of Benfey, there is a French translation by Lancereau with a discussion of the history of the fables.

Panchavati (pan'cha-va-tē). In Sanskrit mythology, part of the great southern forest near the sources of the Godavari, where Rama during his exile passed a long period.

Panches (pän'chās). A name given by early historians of New Granada to Indian tribes in the valleys south of Bogotá included in the modern departments of Tolima, Cundinamarca, and Cauca. They were described as very savage and as cannibals. Probably the name was given to them by the Chibchas, and it may have been applied to many distinct tribes. Herrera states that the Panche language was widely extended, nearly surrounding the Chibcha territory — a statement which has led Dr. Brinton to include these Indians, with others, in the Paniquita stock (which see).

Panch Mahals (panch mahlz'). A district in Gujarat, Bombay British India, situated about lat. 22° 50′ N., long. 73° 50′ E. Area, 1,613 square miles. Population (1881), 255,479. Also Panch Mehals.

Panckoucke (poñ-kōk'), Charles Joseph. Born at Lille, France, Nov. 26, 1736; died at Paris, Dec. 19, 1798. A French publisher, translator, and writer.

Panckoucke, Charles Louis Fleury. Born at Paris, Dec. 23, 1780; died there, July 12, 1844. A French publisher, translator, and writer, son of C. J. Panckoucke.

Pancras (pan'kras), L. Pancratius (pan-krā'shi-us), Saint. A martyr at Rome under Diocletian. He was only 14 at the time of his death, and was subsequently regarded as the patron saint of children.

Pancsova (pän'chō-vo). A town in the county of Torontal, Hungary, situated on the Temes 10 miles east-northeast of Belgrad. Here, July 30, 1739, the Austrians defeated the Turks, and in 1849 the Austrians defeated the Hungarians. Population (1880), 17,948.

Panda (pan'dä). See Iphtan.

Pandareos (pan-dā'rē-ōs). [Gr. Πανδάρεως.] In Greek legend, a native of Miletus who stole the golden dog made by Hephæstus from the temple of Zeus in Crete, and gave it to Tantalus. For decoying its possession Tantalus was buried in Mount Sipylus, and Pandareos was slain. His daughters were brought up by Aphrodite.

Pandarus (pan'da-rus). [Gr. Πάνδαρος.] In Greek legend, an ally of the Trojans during the siege of Troy, leader of the Zelcians or Lycians. He is represented in medieval romance, and by Chaucer, Shakspere, etc., as a procurer. See Cressid.

Pandataria (pan-da-tā'ri-ä). [Gr. Πανδατερία.] In ancient geography, one of the Ponza Islands, situated in the Mediterranean west of Naples: the modern Vandotena. It was the place of banishment of Julia, Agrippina, and Octavia.

Pandavas (pän'da-vaz). [Skt.] Descendants of Pandu. See Pandu.

Pandects of Justinian. [From Gr. πανδέκτης, all-containing.] A collection of Roman civil law made by the emperor Justinian in the 7th century, containing decisions on judgments of lawyers, to which the emperor gave the force and authority of law. This compilation, the most important of the body of Roman civil law, consists of 50 books. Also called the Digest. Compare Corpus Juris.

The popular story, already much discredited, that the famous copy of the Pandects now in the Laurentian Library at Florence was brought to Pisa from Amalfi, after the capture of that city by Roger, king of Sicily, with the aid of a Pisan fleet in 1135, and became the means of diffusing an acquaintance with that portion of the law through Italy, is shown by him [Savigny] not only to rest on very slight evidence, but to be unquestionably, in the latter and more important circumstance, destitute of all foundation. Hallam, Lit., p. 53.

Pandemos (pan-dē'mos). [Gr. πάνδημος, common to all the people.] A surname of Aphrodite, alluding both to her sensual character and to her function as the unifier of the scattered population in one social body.

Panderpur (pun-dėr-pör'), or Pandharpur (pun-dar-pör'). A town in Sholapur district, Bombay British India, situated on the Bhima about lat. 17° 41′ N., long. 75° 23′ E. It has a temple of Vishnu. Population (1881), 16,910.

Pandies (pan'diz). [From Hind. pandá, a Brahman.] The Hindus; the Sepoys; especially applied by the British troops to the Sepoys in the Indian mutiny of 1857–58.

Pandion (pan-dī'on). [Gr. Πανδίων.] In Greek legend, a king of Athens, father of Procne and Philomela.

Pandora (pan-dō'rä). [Gr. Πανδώρα, all-gifted, or all-giver.] In Greek mythology, the first woman, created by Hephæstus at the command of Zeus in revenge for the theft of fire from heaven by Prometheus. The gods endowed her with beauty, cunning, and other attributes fitted to bring his fortune to man. She was given to Epimetheus, who, in accepting the gift, brought down all the evils of life upon his luckless race. According to some accounts she became the mother of Pyrrha and Deucalion; according to others she was their daughter. In a later form of the legend she received from the gods a box containing the blessings of life, which she opened, thus allowing all the blessings (except hope) to escape.

Pandosia (pan-dō'shi-ä). [Gr. Πανδοσία.] In ancient geography, a place in Bruttium, Italy, near the modern Cosenza. Here, 326 B. C., Alexander, king of Epirus, was defeated by the Bruttians.

Pandosto (pan-dos'tō), or the Triumph of Time. A romance by Robert Greene, published in 1588. It was based on a Polish romance. The second title is "The History of Dorastus and Fawnia": the later editions have this as the title. Shakspere founded his "Winter's Tale" on this story: the character of Pandosto was the original of Polixenes, king of Bohemia, in Shakspere's play.

Pandrosos (pan'drō-sos). [Gr. Πάνδροσος.] In Greek mythology, a daughter of Cecrops. She had a sanctuary at Athens.

Pandu (pän'dö). [Skt., 'the pale.'] Brother of Dhritarashtra, king of Hastinapura and father of the Pandavas or Pandu princes. See Mahabharata.

Pandulf, or Pandulph (pan'dulf). Died 1226. A cardinal in the papal service, prominent in English politics in the reigns of John and Henry III.

Paneas (pan-ē-as'). See Cæsarea Philippi.

Pangani (päng-gä'nē). A seaport on the eastern coast of Africa, at the mouth of the Rufu or Rufa, about lat. 5° 30′ S.

Pangaum. See Goa, New.

Panglos (pan'glos), Doctor. ['All-tongues.'] Dr. Pangloss in "Candide," an obstinately optimistic philosopher, the tutor of Candide. His favorite maxim is that "all is for the best in this best of possible worlds."—2. In Colman the younger's play "The Heir-at-Law," a pedantic but gay and amusing prig, the tutor of Dick Dowlas; a satire on the mercenary and disreputable tutors of the period.

Pango Pango (pang'go-pang'go). A large haven on the southern side of Tutuila in the Samoan Islands. It has been occupied by the United States as a coaling station since 1872.

Pangwe (päng'we). See Fan.

Panhandle, or Pan Handle (pan'han'dl). A popular name for: (a) The northern part of West Virginia, projecting strip lying between Pennsylvania and Ohio. (b) The northern extension of Texas. (c) The northern extension of Idaho.

Panhellenius (pan-he-lē'ni-us). [Gr. Πανελλήνιος, of all the Greeks.] In Greek mythology, a surname of Zeus.

Pani. See Penates.

Panicale. See Masolino da Panicale.

Panini (pä'ni-ni). The greatest of Sanskrit grammarians. He is said to have been born at Shalatura in the Gandhara country (Kandahar), northwest of Attock on the Indus: "Respecting his period nothing really trustworthy is known, but he is with much probability held to have lived some time (two to four centuries) before the Christian era" (Whitney). His grammar consists of eight lectures, each divided into four chapters, and each of these into a number of sutras or aphorisms, the whole number of these being 3,996 or 3,997. It traces phenomena wherever found instead of classifying material, and is accordingly a sort of natural history of the language. To attain greater conciseness an arbitrary symbolical language is coined, the key to which must be acquired to make the rules intelligible. The first adhyaya or lecture explains the technical terms and their use. The whole work is, in fact, a sort of grammatical algebra. The great significance of this in the circumstance that the whole of the more modern Sanskrit literature has been pressed into the mold prepared by Panini and his school. Panini has been edited, translated, and explained by Böhtlingk in his "Paninis Grammatik" (new edition, Leipsic, 1887). See also Goldstücker's "Panini: His Place in Sanskrit Literature" (London, 1861).

Panipat, or Paniput (pän-i-put'). A town in the Punjab, British India, 56 miles north of Delhi. Here, in 1526, a victory was gained by Baber the Mogul conqueror over the Sultan of Delhi, which laid the foundation of the Mogul empire; here, in 1556, a victory was gained by Akbar; and here, in Jan., 1761, the Afghans under Ahmed Shah Durani defeated the Mahrattas and broke their power. Population (1881), 25,022.

Paniquitas (pä-nē-kē'täs). [So called from their principal modern village.] Indians of Colombia, Department of Cauca, in the mountains near Popayan. They are (perhaps) descended from the ancient Panches (which see).

Paniquita stock (pä-nē-kē'tä stok). The name proposed by Dr. Brinton for a linguistic stock of Indians in Colombia. Besides the modern Paniquitas and Paez or Paezes, he refers to it, provisionally, several old tribes whose languages are known, namely the Musos, Panches, Colimas, and Pijaos. Nearly all of these were at war with the Chibchas before the conquest, and they were less advanced in civilization than that tribe. Many of them flattened the head artificially. See Musos, Pijaos, and Panches.

Panixer (pä'nik-ser) Pass. A pass on the border of the cantons of Glarus and Grisons, Switzerland. It was the scene of the victory of Suvarroff's army in Oct., 1799. Height, 7,907 feet.

Panizzi (pä-nēt'sē), Sir Anthony. Born at Brescello, Modena, Sept. 16, 1797; died at London, April 8, 1879. Chief librarian of the British Museum. He took his degree at the University of Parma, and became an advocate. Implicated in the revolutionary attempt of 1821, he fled to England, and in 1823 was made professor of Italian in University College, London. In 1828, and in 1831 was appointed assistant librarian in the British Museum. In 1837 he became keeper of the printed books, and devised the catalogue. He was made principal librarian in 1856. The construction of the reading-room from his design was finished in 1857. He retired in July, 1866. He was also active in the interests of the revolution in Italy.

Panjab, or Punjab (pun-jäb'), or Punjaub (pun-jäb'), or Penjab (pen-jäb'). [Hind., 'five rivers.'] The country of the five rivers, tributaries of the Indus — the Sutlej, Bias, Ravi, Chenab, and Jhelum; in an extended sense, a lieutenant-governorship of British India, including the Panjab proper and adjacent regions, and situated northwest of the Northwest Provinces. Capital, Lahore. The surface is generally a plain. The Panjab is the seat of the Sikhs. It formed part of the Mogul empire, and was invaded by Nadir Shah and other conquerors in the 18th century. The Sikh power was consolidated under Ranjit Singh (died 1839). The first Sikh war with the British was fought in 1846; the second in 1848–49. The Panjab was annexed by Great Britain in 1849. Area, 110,667 square miles. Population (1891), 20,866,847.

Panna, or Punnah (pun'ä). A state in Bundelkhand, India, under British control, intersected by lat. 24° 40′ N., long. 80° 15′ E. Area, 2,568 square miles. Population (1881), 227,306.

Pannonia (pa-nō'ni-ä). [Gr. Παννονία.] In ancient geography, a Roman province, bounded by the Danube on the north and east, Mœsia and Illyricum on the south, and Noricum on the west. It corresponded to Hungary south and west of the Danube, Slavonia, and parts of Austria, Styria, Carniola, Croatia, and Bosnia; was made a Roman province by Tiberius; was divided by Trajan into Upper Pannonia in the west and lower Pannonia in the east; was subdivided by Diocletian; and passed later to the East Goths, Lombards, Huns, Slavs, and Magyars.

Panom-Penh, or Panompeng. See Pnom-Penh.

Panopolis (pan-op'ō-lis). [Gr. Πανόπολις, city of Pan.] The ancient name of Akhmim.

Panoptes (pan-op'tēz). [Gr. Πανόπτης, all-seer.] A surname of Argus.

Panormus (pa-nōr'mus). [Gr. Πάνορμος, all-haven.] The ancient name of Palermo.

Panos (pä'nōs). Indians of Peru, in the forests near the Ucayale River, northeast of Cerro de Pasco. They were formerly numerous, and during the 17th century many of them were gathered into mission villages. The missionaries described them as savages of a rather low grade, but practising agriculture and possessing it is said the art of hieroglyphic writing on bark. The missions were broken up in 1767, and most of the Panos returned to their wild life, forming numerous petty tribes. The few remaining are friendly to the whites.

Pano stock (pä'nō stok). A linguistic stock of South American Indians, mainly in northern Peru near the Ucayale and Huallaga Rivers. It includes, among others, the Panos, Cachibos, Conibos, Setibos, Remos, etc., in Peru, the Mayorunas on the river Javary, the Pacaguaras of the Beni, and possibly the Caripunas of the Madeira. Most of the tribes are very savage, and enemies of the whites.

Pansa (pan'zā), Caius Vibius. Died 43 B.C. A Roman consul 43 B.C., the colleague of Hirtius. He was killed in the war against Antony.

Pansa, House of. See Pompeii.

Pantænus (pan-tē'nus). [Gr. Παντανος.] Lived at the end of the 2d century A.D. The leader of the catechetical school in Alexandria.

Pantagoras (pān-tā-gō'rōs). An Indian tribe of Colombia, formerly populous and powerful in the valley of the Magdalena, about lat. 7° N. They resisted the Spaniards with great courage, and many of them were killed or enslaved. A few remain in the marshy lands near the river. They have been referred to the Panquita linguistic stock.

Pantagruel (pan-tag'rō-el; F. pron. poñ-tā-grüel'). The king of the Dipsodes and son of Gargantua, in Rabelais's "History of Gargantua and Pantagruel." See Gargantua.

Pantalon (pan'ta-lon, or Pantalone (pān-tā-lō'ne). A typical character in Italian comedy, of Venetian origin, represented as an old man; the English Pantaloon.

Pantellaria (pān-tel-lā-rē'ā), or Pantelleria (pān-tel-le-rē'ā), or Pantalaria (pān-tā-lā-rē'ā). 1. An island in the Mediterranean Sea, situated in lat. 36° 48′ N., long. 12° E.; the ancient Cosyra or Cossura. It belongs to the province of Trapani, Sicily. The surface is volcanic. Area, 58 square miles. Population (1881), 7,178.

2. The chief town of the island, situated on the northwest coast. Population, about 3,000.

Panthays (pan'thāz). The Mohammedans of the province of Yunnan, China. They proclaimed their independence in 1855, but were put down about 1872.

Pantheon (pan'thē-on). [Gr. Πάνθειον, neut. of πάνθειος, of all gods.] A building at Rome, now dedicated as the Church of Santa Maria Rotonda, completed by Agrippa in 27 B.C., and consecrated to the divine ancestors of the Julian family. It is preceded by an octastyle pedimented Corinthian portico, with 2 ranges of 4 columns inside. The plan is that of a cylinder, with a lateral rectangular and semicircular niches, whose entablature is upheld by columns. The interior diameter is 142½ feet, and the height to the apex of the great hemispherical coffered dome is the same. The lighting of the interior is solely from an open circle 28 feet in diameter, at the summit of the dome. The effect of the interior is unique and highly imposing. The construction is of concrete, lightly faced with brick, and incrusted (now almost exclusively in the interior) with marble. The dome is practically solid concrete, the familiar system of inset arches being merely one brick deep, and having served as a scaffolding during the erection. Raphael, Annibale Caracci, and Victor Emmanuel II. are buried in the Pantheon. It has been proved that the temple never was connected with the baths of Agrippa.

Panthéon (poñ-tā-ôñ'). The Church of Ste. Geneviève in Paris, a large classical building in the form of a Greek cross, 276 by 370 ft., with a central dome 272 feet high and 75 in diameter. The Corinthian columns of the entrance portico are 81 feet high. The pediment is filled with a sculptured group, by David d'Angers, representing France distributing laurels to her deserving children. The interior is simple and well proportioned. Its walls are in large part covered with paintings, by some of the chief of modern artists. Illustrations of the development of French history and civilization. There are also some statues of distinguished men. Clovis built on this spot the Church of St. Peter and St. Paul, where he was, save afterward Ste. Clotilde and Ste. Geneviève from whom it took its later name. This church was probably destroyed by the Normans in the 9th century. The relics of Ste. Geneviève established their cloister here in 1148, in the papacy of Eugenius III. Their Romanesque church was replaced by a late-Gothic building after 1489. In 1764 the present church was begun under Louis XV., and in 1791 was first set apart for its present purpose – that of a mausoleum for Frenchmen adjudged worthy of fame.

Pantheon of the British, The. Westminster Abbey.

Pantibibla (pan-ti-bib'lā). See the extract.

From the earliest period the literature of Chaldea was stored in public libraries. According to Berosus, Pantibibla, or 'book-town,' was one of the antediluvian cities of Babylonia, and Xisuthros had buried his books at Sippara — perhaps in reference to the Semitic sephēr, 'book' — before the Flood. Sayce, Anc. Empires, p. 166.

Panticapæum (pan'ti-ka-pē'um). [Gr. Παντικάπαιον.] The ancient name of Kertch.

Pantschatantra. See Panchatantra.

Pánuco (pā'nū-kō). [Probably from the name of an Indian chief.] The name given by the Spanish conquerors of Mexico to a region on the Gulf Coast, about the Pánuco River (northern Vera Cruz and southern Tamaulipas). It was partially conquered by Cortes in 1522; was claimed by Francisco de Garay in 1523; and in 1526 was assigned to Nuño de Guzman. Somewhat later it was limited to 50 Spanish leagues in length and breadth, though Guzman claimed that it extended westward to the Pacific.

Panurge (pa-nėrj'; F. pron. pā-nürzh'). [Gr. πανοῦργος, a rogue, lit. 'all-doer.'] A character in Rabelais's "History of Gargantua and Pantagruel."

A very important personage in "Pantagruel" is Panurge, a singular companion whom Pantagruel picks up at Paris and who is perhaps the greatest single creation of Rabelais. Some ideas may have been taken for him from the Cingar of Merlinus Cocaius, or Folengo, a Macaronic Italian poet, but on the whole he is original, and is hardly comparable to any one else in literature except Falstaff. The main idea in Panurge is the absence of morality in the wide Aristotelian sense, with the presence of almost all other good qualities. Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 185.

Panyasis (pa-ni'a-sis). [Gr. Πανυασις.] Lived in the first half of the 5th century B.C. A Greek poet of Halicarnassus.

Panyasis, uncle of Herodotus, a man of political note at Halicarnassus, where he fought for the freedom of the town against the tyrant Lygdamis, gained a good deal of temporary celebrity by another "Heracleia," in fourteen books. Considerable fragments of a social nature are quoted from it by Stobæus and Athenæus, which specially refer to the use and abuse of wine-drinking. They are elegantly written, and have the strength of the stricter Peripatetic on the same subject by Xenophanes and Theognis. He was also, according to Suidas, author of elegiac poems, in six books, called "Ionica," on the antiquities of Athens, and especially on the Ionic migration.

Panza (pan'zā; Sp. pron. pān'thā), Sancho. The famous esquire of Don Quixote in Cervantes's romance of that name.

To complete his chivalrous equipment — which he (Don Quixote) resolves to get by setting up for himself a suit of armor strange to his century — he took an esquire [Sancho Panza] out of his neighborhood: a middle-aged peasant, ignorant and credulous, but of great good-nature; a glutton and a liar; selfish and gross, yet attached to his master; shrewd enough occasionally to see the folly of their position, but always amusing, and sometimes instructive, in his interpretations of it. Ticknor, Span. Lit., II. 140.

Panzer (pänt'ser), Georg Wolfgang. Born at Sulzbach, March 16, 1729; died at Nuremberg, July 9, 1804. A German clergyman and bibliographer, noted for researches in the history of the art of printing: chief pastor at Nuremberg. He published "Annales typographici" (1793–1803).

Paola (pā'ō-lā). A seaport in the province of Cosenza, Calabria, Italy, situated on the western coast 13 miles northwest of Cosenza. It has a trade in oil and wine. Population (1881), 8,097.

Paola, Fra. See Sarpi.

Paoli (pā-ō'lē). A place in Chester County, Pennsylvania, 20 miles west by north of Philadelphia. Here, Sept. 20, 1777, the Americans under Wayne were surprised and defeated by the British.

Paoli (pā'ō-lē). Pasquale. Born at Morosaglia, in Corsica, 1726; died near London, Feb. 5, 1807. A Corsican patriot and general. He became generalissimo and head of the government in 1755, carried on war with Genoa; was driven from Corsica to England by the French in 1769; returned as lieutenant-general in 1790; formed a conspiracy with the aid of Great Britain and Russia, and became generalissimo in 1793; and left Corsica finally in 1796.

Paouting (pā-ō-ting'), or Paoting, or Pauting. One of the chief cities of the province of Chihli, China, situated on the river Yungting about 90 miles southwest of Peking.

Pápa (pā'po). A town in the county of Veszprém, Hungary, 59 miles south by east of Presburg. Population (1890), 14,261.

Papago (pā'pā-gō). [Pl., also Papayos. Corrupted from their own name for themselves.] An agricultural tribe of Arizona and Sonora, Indians, closely allied to the Pima, inhabiting the territory south and southeast of the Gila River, on Gila Bend reservation, especially south of Tucson, southern Arizona, and extending into Sonora, Mexico. Number in United States, 5,163; there are probably as many more in Mexican territory. See Piman.

Papal States, or States of the Church. [It. Stato Pontificio, Stato Pontificio, etc.; F. Etats de l'Eglise; G. Kirchenstaat.] A former dominion of Italy, governed directly by the papal see. In 1859 it was bounded on the north by the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom, on the east by the Adriatic, on the southeast by the kingdom of Naples, on the southwest by Naples, Tuscany, and on the west by Tuscany and the duchy of Modena. It comprised the Romagna, the Marches, Umbria, and the present province of Rome. It originated in the grant of the exarchate of Ravenna by Pepin the Short to Stephen II. in 755, confirmed by Charles the Great; received important territories by the will of Matilda of Tuscany in the 12th century; became independent of the empire about 1300; acquired Bologna, Ancona, Ravenna, and Ferrara in the 16th century; and was obliged to cede Avignon, Venaissin, Romagna, Bologna, and Ferrara in 1797. A Roman republic was proclaimed in 1798; the papal power was partly restored in 1801; the remaining territories were incorporated with France in 1808–09; the Papal States were restored in 1814; the revolution of 1848 was suppressed in 1849; nearly all the territory (including the Marches, Umbria, and Romagna) was annexed to Italy in 1860; and the remainder (including Rome and neighboring districts) was annexed to Italy in 1870.

Papal Tyranny in the Reign of King John. Cibber's alteration of Shakspere's "King John," produced in 1745; it had been "burked" in 1736–37.

Papanazes (pā-pā-nā'zās). [Probably a double plural from Papanaz.] Indians on or near the Brazilian coast of Espirito Santo and Porto Seguro at the time of the Portuguese conquest. They were of the Tupi race. See Tupes.

Papenburg (pä'pen-bōrg). A town in the province of Hannover, Prussia, situated on a canal near the Ems, 57 miles west of Bremen. Population (1890), 6,933.

Paper King, The. A surname given to John Law, from his financial schemes.

Paphian (pā'fi-an) Goddess, The. An epithet of Aphrodite, from the worship paid her in Paphos.

Paphlagonia (paf-la-gō'ni-ā). [Gr. Παφλαγονία.] In ancient geography, a country in Asia Minor, bounded by the Black Sea on the north, Pontus (separated by the Halys) on the east, Galatia on the south, and Bithynia on the west. The surface is generally mountainous. The country was semi-independent under Persian and Macedonian rule. It passed later to Pontus, and with that to Rome in 65 B.C.

Paphos (pā'fos). [Gr. Πάφος.] In ancient geography, the name of two cities in Cyprus. old Paphos was situated near the village of Kuklia, and celebrated temple of Astarte, or Venus, here was built of unburned brick and wood on a stone foundation measuring 164 by 230 feet. A large fragment of the wall was a batylus. The temple stood in a large inclosure whose walls were likewise of sun-dried brick on a massive stone foundation. New Paphos was situated on the western coast 8–9 miles northwest of Old Paphos. It was a commercial center.

Papias (pā'pi-as). [Gr. Παπίας.] Lived about 130 A.D. An early Christian writer, bishop of Hierapolis in Phrygia. He was the author of a work (lost except in fragments) "Exposition of the Oracles of the Lord." See the extract.

What has given celebrity to the name of Papias is his authorship of a treatise in five books called "Expositions of Oracles of the Lord" (Λογιων κυριακων ἐξηγησεις), which title we shall make further remark presently. The object of the book seems to have been to throw light on the Gospel history, and in particular to do so by the help of oral traditions which Papias had been able to collect from those who had come in contact with surviving members of the Apostolic circle. The fact that Papias lived at a time when it was still possible to meet such persons has given such importance to his testimony that though only some very few fragments of his work remain, they have given occasion to whole treatises; every word of these fragments being rigidly scrutinised, and, what is less reasonable in the case of a book of which so little is known, arguments being built on the silence of Papias about sundry matters which it is supposed he ought to have mentioned and assumed that he did not.

Smith and Wace, Dict. of Christian Biography, IV. 185.

Papin (pā'pin; F. pron. pā-pañ'). Denis. Born at Blois, France, Aug. 22, 1647: died 1710. A French physicist, inventor of "Papin's digester."

Papineau (pā-pē-nō'), Louis Joseph. Born at Montreal, Oct., 1789; died Sept. 23, 1871. A French-Canadian politician. He was elected to the legislative assembly of Lower Canada in 1809; was admitted to the bar in 1812; and was chosen speaker of the house in 1815. He was one of the leaders of the French-Canadian insurrection of 1837, fled to the United States, and resided chiefly in France till 1847, when he returned under the general amnesty of 1840. He was afterward a member of the United Parliament.

Papinian (pa-pin'i-an), L. Æmilius Papinianus. Executed by Caracalla, 212 A.D. A Roman jurist, pretorian prefect under Septimius Severus.

A friend of Severus and of almost the same age with him was the great jurist Æmilius Papinianus. Under Severus he was prefectus pretorio, but was executed soon after Caracalla's accession to the throne, on account of his loyalty to the other son, Geta. Papinian was remarkable not only for his profound learning, for the independence of judgment, the laxity and firmness manifested in the judicial decisions on individual cases which he gave with the aid of his large experience, but also for his quick sense of right and morality, by which he frequently rose above the barriers of national prejudices, and merited the highest veneration of succeeding centuries. The most important of his works are the "Books of Questions and the 19 books of Responsa, both of which have been much used in the famous collections. His diction is conspicuous for conciseness and exactness, but for the very reason is not equally delightful to all.

Teuffel and Schwabe, Hist. of Roman Lit. (tr. by Wagn. II. 254.

Papiocos (pä-pē-ō'kōs), or Piapocos (pē-ä-pō'-kos). An Indian tribe of southwestern Venezuela, on the river Guaviare near its junction with the Orinoco. They are of Arawak or Maypure stock.

It is the center of the river trade of the Amazon region, and exports rubber, cacao, copaiba balsam, hides, nuts, etc. It was founded in Dec., 1615. Population about 50,000.

Parabosco (pä-rä-bos'kō), Girolamo. Born at Piacentino: died at Venice about 1557. A noted Italian musician and poet. He was organist and chapel-master at St. Mark's in Venice. He published "Rime" (poems, 1547), "Il Progno" (1548; a tragedy), "Lettere" (1543–52), "I Diporti" (1552; a collection of 17 novels), and opuscules which were collected and published at Venice (1560), etc.

Paracelsus (par-a-sel'sus), Philippus Aureolus (originally Theophrastus Bombastus von Hohenheim). Born at Maria-Einsiedeln, Switzerland, Dec. 17, 1493; died at Salzburg, Sept. 24, 1541. A celebrated German-Swiss physician and alchemist. He entered the University of Basel at the age of sixteen, but left without a degree, and spent many years in travel and intercourse with distinguished persons. He believed in medicine as based from about 1526 to 1528, while he was driven from the city by the medical corporations, whose methods he had severely criticised. He is important in the history of medicine chiefly on account of the impulse which he gave to the development of pharmaceutical chemistry. He was also the author of a visionary and theosophical system of philosophy. The best collective edition of his works appeared at Basel in 1589–91. Among the many legends concerning him is that of his sword in the hilt of which he kept a familiar or small demon.

Paracelsus. A poem by Robert Browning, published in 1835.

Paraclet (par'a-klāt). A hamlet near Nogent-sur-Seine, Aube, France. It was formerly the seat of a nunnery founded in 1123 by Abelard, of which Heloise was abbess.

Paradise. A fresco by Orcagna, in Santa Maria Novella, Florence, notable for the solemnity and harmonious composition. Christ and the Virgin are enthroned above great companies of apostles, martyrs, saints, and angels. The fine companion pieces are the "Last Judgment" and "Hell."

Paradise. A painting by Tintoretto, the largest picture ever painted on canvas (84 by 25½ feet), covering the east wall of the Sala del Maggior Consiglio in the ducal palace at Venice. It is darkened by injudicious restoration, but is highly impressive in composition, and full of beauties of detail.

Paradise Lost. An epic poem by John Milton, published in 1667, in twelve books. The subject is the fall of man. This is his greatest work, and the chief epic in the English language.

Paradise of Dainty Devices, The. A collection of poems compiled by Richard Edwards in 1576. It was very popular, and went through nine or ten editions before 1600.

Paraguay (par'a-gwī), Sp. and Pg. Paraguaya (pär-ä-gwī'ä). A river of South America, properly the upper portion of the Paraná. It rises in the table-land of western Brazil near lat. 14° 15′ S., flows south, and unites with the Upper Paraná to form the Lower Paraná in lat. 27° 17′ S., long. 58° 20′ W. It flows successively through Brazil, between Brazil and Bolivia, through northern Paraguay, separating the Paraguayan Chaco from the rest of the latter, and finally between Paraguay and the Argentine Republic. In Brazil it is bordered by the vast swamps region called the Charnes marshes (see Charcas). The principal navigable affluents are the Sandbanges (receiving the Chuabré) and Taquary on the east, and the Pilcomayo and Vermejo on the west. Length, about 1,500 miles (with the Lower Paraná and Plata, 2,500 miles); navigable to Villa Bella, 300 miles from its source.

Paraguay. An interior republic of South America, between the Paraná on the east and south and the Paraguay on the west, with a westward extension between the Paraguayan and Pilcomayo; bounded north by Bolivia and Brazil, east by Brazil, and south and west by the Argentine Republic. Capital, Asuncion. The main portion is hilly or mountainous, with a line of high hills, called mountains in the interior; the part west of the Paraguay, included in the Gran Chaco region (which see), is flat, partly swampy, and thinly inhabited except with Indians. The principal ascent-tropical. The principal products are hides, fruits, a little sugar, tobacco, and mate or Paraguay tea. Most of the inhabitants are descended from Spaniards and Guarany Indians; the common language is a corrupt form of Guarany, but Spanish is spoken in the larger places. The prevailing religion is Roman Catholic. Executive authority is vested in a president elected for four years, and congress consists of a senate and a chamber of deputies. The country has a very imperfect railroad and telegraph system. Asuncion, settled by Spaniards in 1536, and the colony at first included all the Platine region; the southern part was separated in 1620, and the country, as a province, appears distinctly with its present limits, was attached to the viceroyalty of La Plata in 1776. Jesuit influence became predominant in the 17th century, and the order established a semi-independent government. It was expelled in 1767. The colony declared its independence in 1811, refusing to unite with the Argentine Confederation. It was successively under the absolute dictatorships of Francia (1815–40), C. A. Lopez (1841–62), and F. L. Lopez (1862–70). The last in 1865 provoked a war with Brazil, the Argentine, and Uruguay (see Triple Alliance, War of). Which lasted till 1870. At the close of the war the country had been completely impoverished and a great part of the adult male population had been killed. The present constitution was adopted in 1870. The territory west of the Paraguay (Paraguayan Chaco) was claimed by the Argentine, but was awarded to Paraguay by the arbitration of President Hayes of the United States in 1878. Area, about 99,000 square miles. The very imperfect census of 1886 gave a civilized population of 329,645, which is probably much below the true total. The area, besides, about 100,000 Indians.

Paraguayan War. See Triple Alliance, War of the.

Parahyba, or Paraiba, or Paraiba (pä-rä-ē'-bä). 1. A river in the state of Parahyba, Brazil, length, over 200 miles. Paran (pa'ran). In Bible geography, a wilderness south of Palestine and north of Sinai. It was the scene of the wanderings of the Israelites before they entered Canaan.

Paraná (pä-rä-nä'). A river of South America, flowing into the Plata, which forms the estuary of the Paraná and Uruguay. It is divided physically into the Upper and Lower Paraná. The latter is properly a continuation of the Paraguay, the Upper Paraná being an eastern affluent. It has a general southerly course, entirely in the Argentine Republic, and its principal affluent is the Salado in the west. The Upper Paraná is formed by the junction of the Rio Grande and Paranahyba in Brazil (near lat. 19° S., long. 51° 40′ W.). It receives several large Brazilian rivers (the Pardo, Tieté, Paranapanema, Ivahy, etc.); flows southward between Brazil and Paraguay; turns westward between Paraguay and the Argentine Republic; and by its junction with the Paraguay (lat. 27° 17′ S., long. 58° 20′ W.) forms the Lower Paraná. The central portion is obstructed by rapids and falls, the highest being the Sete Quedas (which see). Length of the Upper Paraná, about 1,200 miles (or, with the Paranaguassu, 1,720 miles); navigable to the Apipe rapids (about 150 miles). Length of the Lower Paraná, 850 miles (or, with the Plata, 1,080 miles); entirely navigable.

Parashurama (pa-rash'ō-ri'ma). [‘Rama with the ax.’] The first of the three Ramas, and the sixth avatara or incarnation of Vishnu. Vishnu having appeared in this incarnation to repress the tyranny of the Kshatriya, or military caste. He expiates the crimes of the Kshatriya in the Kshatriya. He was a Brahman, the fifth son of Jamadagni, and on his father's side descended from Bhrigu, whence he is the Bhargava, while on the mother side he was of the race of the Kushikas. In the Mahabharata he instructs Arjuna in the use of arms and fights with Bhishma; is present at a war council of the Kauravas; and is struck senseless by Ramachandra, the seventh avatara. In the Ramayana, Parashurama, angered by Rama's breaking the bow of Shiva, challenges him to a trial of strength, and is defeated by him.

Parasitaster (par-a-si-tas'tėr), or the Fawn. A play by Marston, acted at Blackfriars in 1604, and printed in 1606.

The writers of Jonson's days seem to have connected, I know not why, the idea of a spy or splenetic observer with that of a faun. Marston calls one of his plays "The Fawne," in allusion to a character in disguise who watches and exposes all the persons of the drama in succession.

Gifford, Note to Jonson's Poetaster, p. 245.

Paravilhanas (pä-rä-vēl-yä'näs). A tribe of Indians in northern Brazil, on the confines of Venezuela and British Guiana, about the head waters of the Rio Branco. Formerly numerous, they are now nearly or quite extinct. They have been referred to the Carib stock.

Paray-le-Monial (pä-rä'le-mō-nyäl'). A town in the department of Saône-et-Loire, France, situated on the Bourbince 33 miles west by north of Mâcon. It is noted as a place of pilgrimage, and for its convent of the Visitation and its church. Population (1891), commune, 3,885.

Pardo (pär'dō). Manuel. Born at Lima, Aug. 12, 1834; assassinated there, Nov. 16, 1878. A Peruvian statesman. He was a banker, and was minister of the treasury under Balta, 1868–68. From Aug. 2, 1872, to Aug. 2, 1876, he was president of Peru. He was the first civilian who attained this position, and was one of the best presidents the republic ever had. At the time of his death he was president of the senate.

Pardoe (pär'dō), Julia. Born at Beverley, Yorkshire, England, 1806; died 1862. An English historical and miscellaneous writer.

Pardon de Ploërmel (pär-dōñ' de plō-er-mel'), Le. An opera by Meyerbeer, first produced at Paris, 1850. See Dinorah.

Pardubitz (pär'dō-bits). A town in Bohemia, situated at the junction of the Chrudimka with the Elbe, 59 miles east of Prague. Population (1890), commune, 12,367.

Paré (pa-rā'), Ambroise. See Parœus.

Ambroise. Born at Laval, Mayenne, France, 1517; died at Paris, Dec. 22, 1590. A French surgeon, the founder of scientific surgery in France. He introduced improvements in the treatment of gunshot-wounds, the use of ligatures, etc. His works were published in 1564.

Pareeis (pa-rā-sēs'). A tribe or race of Indians in western Brazil (state of Matto Grosso), on the plateau called Campos dos Pareeis, about the head waters of the rivers Paraguay, Guaporé, and Tapajós. They live in fixed villages, practise agriculture, and are generally friendly to the whites, though have few relations with them. Formerly the Paresi was one of the most powerful of this region, but so far as is known only a few hundreds survive. They belong to the Maypure-Arawak linguistic stock. The Guanches, Incas, and other tribes classed with the Pareeis by Martius are now known to be widely separated by their languages. Also written Pareeis, Pariâsi, etc.

Pareeis, Campos dos. See Campos dos Pareeis.

Pareeis, Serra dos. A name given to the southwestern edge of the Brazilian plateau (Campos dos Pareeis), where it faces the river Guaporé.

Paredes (pä-rā'dās), José Gregorio. Born at Lima, 1779; died there, Dec. 16, 1839. A Peruvian mathematician. He was appointed official cosmographer in 1812, and under the republic held various high offices, including the ministry of the treasury. Paredes published several works on mathematics and physics, but is best known for his "Almanacs," 1810–39, which contain numerous historical and geographical notes of much value.

Paredes, Mariano. Born about 1800: died at Granada, Nicaragua, Dec. 2, 1856. A Guatemalan general and politician. He was president of Guatemala, Jan. 1, 1849, to Jan. 1, 1851, but was practically head of Carrera, who succeeded him. At the time of his death he was fighting against Walker.

Paredes y Arrillaga (ē-är-rēl-yä'gä), Mariano. Born at Mexico, Jan. 6, 1797: died there, Sept., 1849. A Mexican general. He led the revolution against Herrera, and after an overthrow of the latter was elected president ad interim Jan. 3, 1846, serving until July 28, when he was forced to resign. During this period the war with the United States began: the republic was practically in a condition of anarchy.

Pareja (pä-rā'hä), Juan de. Born at Seville about 1606: died at Madrid, 1670. A Spanish painter, a pupil and originally a slave of Velasquez. He was most successful in portraits. Velasquez freed him, but he remained in his service. The portrait of him by Velasquez represents a mulatto.

Pareja y Septien (ē sāp-tē-än'), José Manuel. Born at Lima, Peru, 1812; died at Valparaiso, Chile, Nov. 28, 1865. A Spanish naval officer. He commanded the fleet which, in Sept., 1865, provoked hostilities with Chile and blockaded the Chilean ports. One of his gunboats having been taken by the Chilicans, Pareja committed suicide.

Parenis (pä-rā-nēs'), or Parenas (pä-rā-näs'). Indians of Venezuela, on the Orinoco above the junction of the Apure. They were gathered into missions in the 18th century, and as a tribe are now practically extinct. They belonged to the Arawak or Maypure linguistic stock, and their language was closely allied to that of the true Maypures. Also written Parenes.

Parentintims, or Parentintins (pä-ren-tēn-tēns'). Wandering Indians of the Amazon valley, living on both sides of the Tapajós near the lower falls, and ranging westward to the Madeira. They go in small bands, and subsist by hunting and fishing, or by stealing from the plantations of other tribes. The Mundurucus call them, or some of them, Parauanates, and wage a cruel war against them. It is probable that Indians of different races have been confounded under this name.

Parenzo (pä-rent'sō). [L. Parentium.] A seaport in Istria, Austria-Hungary, situated on the Gulf of Venice 31 miles south by west of Triest. The cathedral is a very curious building, founded in 543. It is preceded by an atrium and baptistery, and has 3 naves divided by marble columns with sculptured capitals. The apse is incrusted below with marbles and lined above with early mosaics of the Virgin and saints, and friezes of flowers, fishes, shells, and foliage. Population (1890), 3,126.

Parepa-Rosa (pā-rā'pä-rō'sä), Madame (Euphrosyne Parepa de Boyesku). Born at Edinburgh, May 7, 1836; died at London, Jan. 21, 1874. An English soprano singer in oratorio and opera. She made her debut at Malta in 1857, and first appeared in England in 1857, and in the United States in 1866. She married Carl Rosa in 1867, and they established an opera company in which she was successful.

Parergon. See Agliffe.

Parga (pär'gä). A seaport in Albania, and in Turkish Yilayet of Janina, situated on the Ionian Sea in lat. 39° 17′ N., long. 20° 25′ E. It was under Venetian protection from 1401 to 1797; was besieged by Ali Pasha in 1814; was taken under British protection, and in 1819 was transferred by them to Turkey. The inhabitants abandoned the town in 1819. Population, about 4,000.

Paria (pä'rē-ä or pä-rē-ä'). A peninsula of northeastern Venezuela, projecting eastward between the Caribbean Sea and the Gulf of Paria, and terminating in Cape Paria opposite Trinidad.

Paria, Gulf of. An arm of the Caribbean Sea, between Venezuela and Trinidad.

Pariahs (pä'ri-äz). [Lit. 'drummers' (the Pariahs being the hereditary drum-beaters).] The members of a low caste of Hindus in southern India. They are lower than the regular castes of the Hindu system, and are considered unclean, yet superior to some other castes in the Tamil country, where they constitute a considerable part of the population. They have been commonly supposed aborigines by the agricultural class, or as servants to Europeans.

Parian Chronicle, The. See Chronicle of Paros.

Parias (pä-rē-äs'), or Pariagotos (pä-rē-ä-gō-tōs'). Indians who formerly occupied the peninsula of Paria in northeastern Venezuela. They were among the first of the continental tribes seen by Columbus; later many of them were enslaved. The remnants were gathered into missions, and are now merged in the country population of the coast. They were of Carib stock. Also written Parieotos, etc.

Parieu (pä-ryé'), Marie Louis Pierre Félix Esquirou de. Born at Aurillac, France, April 13, 1815: died April 9, 1893. A French political economist and politician. He was minister of instruction 1849–51.

Parima (pä-rē'mä or pä-rē-mä'). A mythical lake long supposed to exist in the northern part of South Guiana. It was the subject of the romantic story of El Dorado (which see); later, when the search for the gilded king had proved fruitless, geographers clung to the lake. Maps of the 18th century, and even some of later years, represented it as a large body of water in Guiana. Schomburgk's explorations proved that the only lakes in this region were small areas of flooded grassland. The name has been retained for mountains and a river of the same region.

Parima, Sierra or Serra de. Mountains of southern Venezuela, on the confines of Brazil, between the upper Orinoco and its branch the Venturario. Their true nature is little understood, and they are perhaps edges of high plateaux. Humboldt's peaks are said to exceed 6,000 feet in altitude. The Orinoco takes its rise on the southwestern side. The names sometimes extended to the highlands region of Brazil and parts of Venezuela and Brazil and in British Guiana, thus including the Pacaraima Sierra (which see). Often written Parime.

Parini (pä-rē'nē), Giuseppe. Born at Bosisio, near Milan, May 22, 1729: died at Milan, Aug. 15, 1798. An Italian poet. He published the satirical poems "Il mattino" ("Morning," 1763), "Il mezzogiorno" ("Noon," 1765), "Il vespro" ("Evening"), "La notte" ("Night"), etc.

Paris (par'is). [Gr. Πάρις.] 1. In Greek legend, the second son of Priam, king of Troy, and Hecuba; also called Alexander. Before his birth Hecuba dreamt that she had given birth to a firebrand which caused a conflagration of the city. The dream was interpreted to mean that the child by birth too son who would bring disaster on Troy. Paris was accordingly exposed on Mount Ida, but was brought up in obscurity a year, and was ultimately taken home and brought up by the shepherd who was intrusted with his exposure. His parentage was accidentally discovered; he was admitted to the household of Priam, married Œnone, daughter of the river-god Cebren, and became celebrated far and wide for his beauty of person, his gallantry, and his accomplishments. During the nuptials of Peleus and Thetis, Eris, who alone among the gods was not invited, threw a golden apple among the marriage guests with the inscription "To the Fairest." A dispute arose between Hera, Aphrodite, and Athene over the apple, and Zeus ordered Hermes to take the goddesses to Paris, who tended his flocks on Mount Gargarus, a height on Mount Ida, and who was to adjudge the apple. To influence his decision Hera offered him power, Athene martial glory, and Aphrodite the most beautiful of women. He awarded the apple to Aphrodite, who in return assisted him in carrying off from Sparta Helen, the wife of Menelaus. The rape of Helen gave rise to the Trojan war, during which he brought down upon himself the detestation of his own friends by his cowardice and his stubborn determination not to give up Helen. He was fatally wounded by Philoctetes with a poisoned arrow at the taking of Troy.

2. A character in Shakspere's tragedy "Romeo and Juliet," a young nobleman to whom Capulet betrothed his daughter Juliet against her will.

Paris (par'is; F. pa-ris; pär'ēs). [ME. Paris, Parys, AS. Pearis (= Sp. Paris, Pg. Paris, G. Paris, etc.), from L. Parisii, pop. name, pa-rē'sē), F. Paris = It. Parigi, from LL. Pariesi, L. Lutetiæ Parisiorum, Lutetia of the Parisii, a Celtic tribe. Lutetiæ has been referred, without evidence, to L. lutum, mud.] The capital of France, situated on both banks of the Seine in lat. 48° 50′ N., long. 2° 20′ E. (observatory). It is the second largest city in the world, the largest in the continent, in the world; and has long been celebrated as a center of fashion, literature, art, the drama, and scholarship. Its boundaries are the fortifications, 22 miles long, and building constructions. The banks of the Seine, which is 1,476 ft. in width in the city, are connected by 14 bridges, on the island in the Seine. It is the commercial and manufacturing center of France, and the center of the French railway system. Among the leading manufactures are clothing, furniture, articles de Paris, machinery, jewelry, clocks, glove, tapestries, carriages, etc. (for various localities and objects of interest see Bastile, Bourbon, Carnavalet, the Champs-Élysées, the churches of Notre-Dame and the Pantheon, the Theatre Français, the Louvre and the Luxembourg, the Sorbonne, etc., and for many local details, see the separate articles). The Grand Opera is the most conspicuous existing theater. The chief façade is enriched with polychrome materials and adorned with statues and groups of sculpture. The grand vestibule, the grand staircase, and the grand foyer, a hall 157 feet long, 47 wide, and 39 high display on its walls and ceiling the noblest oil paintings by famous French painters. The Opéra-Comique, the Gaîté, Parrassus, and the ancient poets. The city contains many hospitals and museums, and is the seat of many societies, including the Institute of France. Paris is the capital of the department of Seine, and is governed by the municipal council, the prefect of seine, the prefect of police, and the mayors of arrondissements. It was the ancient capital of a small Celtic tribe, the Parisii. It was the capital of Constantius Chlorus 292–306; was made the capital of the Frankish kingdom by Clovis in 508; was ruled by counts under the Carlovingians; became great and powerful under the Capetians; was largely developed under Philip Augustus and St. Louis; suffered from civil strife under Charles VI., was occupied by the English 1420–36, but expelled the English in 1436; was the scene of the massacre of St. Bartholomew in 1572; became the center of the League; was opened to Henry IV. in 1594; and was the scene of many of the events of the first French revolution and in those of 1830 and 1848. International expositions were held here in 1855, 1867, 1878, and 1889. (For the more important sieges and treaties of Paris, see below.) Population (1891), 2,447,957.

Paris, Comte de (Louis Philippe Albert D'Orléans). Born at Paris, Aug. 24, 1838: died at London, Sept. 8, 1894. Head of the Legitimist party in France and claimant of the French throne, eldest son of Ferdinand, duc d'Orléans, and grandson of Louis Philippe. He was in his infancy appointed to the French throne on the death of his father in 1842. He was educated in England, where his mother sought refuge after the overthrow of his grandfather in 1848. In 1861 he returned to France, and entered the staff of General McClellan. He subsequently took up his residence in France, but returned to England on the passage of the expulsion bill in 1886. On the death of the Comte de Chambord, grandson of Charles X. without issue, in 1883, he was recognized by the Legitimists as the head of the royal house of France, and thus as the heir to the claims of the elder branch, younger (Orléans) line of the house of Bourbon. He published "Histoire de la guerre civile en Amérique" (1874–90).

Paris (pä-rēs'), Gaston Gaston Paulin. Born at Avenay, Marne, Aug. 9, 1839. An eminent French Romance philologist. Since 1872 he has occupied a chair of French language and literature at the Collège de France. At the present time (1894) he is the director of the Ecole pratique des Hautes Études, of the Société des Hautes Études at Paris. His first publication of note was "Histoire poétique de Charlemagne" (1865). His edition of "La Vie de Saint Alexis" is truly epoch-making in the annals of French philology. He has also published "La Littérature française au moyen âge," etc., and is connected with many important philological publications in the French language. Among others the "Romania," the "Revue critique," the "Collection d'anciens textes français," and the "Bibliothèque française du moyen âge."

Paris, Sieges and Capitulations of. The most noteworthy of these are the following. (a) Siege by the Northmen in 885–86. It was unsuccessful. (b) Siege by Henry IV. in 1590. The city was successfully defended by the count of Brissac, who capitulated to the Allies, March 31, 1594. (c) Surrender to the Allies July 7, 1815. (d) Siege of 1870–71 by the Germans. It was commenced on Sept. 19, 1870, and the capitulation was signed Nov. 28 (by Jan. 10–13, and Jan. 19, 1871; the city capitulated by the convention of Versailles Jan. 28; the entry of German troops took place on March 1, and the occupation March 2–3). (e) Siege of 1871 by the troops of the National Assembly commanded by MacMahon. Paris being defended by the communists. It began April 6, and finally was ended by the besiegers May 28; many buildings (Hôtel de Ville, Tuileries, etc.) were destroyed by the communists. The insurrection was finally suppressed May 28, 1871.

Paris, Treaties of. Among the various treaties negotiated or concluded at Paris, the following are the most important. (c) Between Great Britain on one side and France, Spain, and Portugal on the other, Feb. 10, 1763. France ceded to Great Britain Canada, Nova Scotia, Cape Breton, Mobile, all the territory east of the Mississippi, Dominica, Tobago, St. Vincent, and Grenada; England ceded to France Guadeloupe, Martinique, Desirade, Marie Galante, and St. Pierre and Miquelon; Spain ceded Florida to Great Britain; England ceded Havana to Spain; and France ceded Louisiana and New Orleans to Spain. (b) Between Great Britain on one side and France, Spain, and the United States on the other, Jan., 1783. The independence of the United States was acknowledged; navigation of the Mississippi was made free to both parties; Minorca and Florida were restored to Spain; the region of the Senegal was granted to France; and mutual restitution was made of conquests in the West Indies. (c) Between France on the one side and Great Britain, Russia, Austria, and Prussia on the other, May 30, 1814; called also the First Peace of Paris. The independence of the Netherlands, Switzerland, and Germanic and Italian states was acknowledged. "France was allowed to retain the boundaries of 1792, with some additions Great Britain was to keep Malta, but to restore all the colonies held by France on Jan. 1, 1792, except Tobago, St. Lucia, and Mauritius, and to restore all the Dutch colonies she held except Ceylon, the Cape, and part of (now British) Guiana. A general congress was to meet at Vienna within two months to complete the arrangements." (Lieber and Boerner, English Political History, p. 166.) (d) Between the same parties as the treaty of 1814, Nov. 20, 1815; called also the Second Peace of Paris. France was reduced nearly to the limits of 1790. "$28,000,000 was to be paid to the Allies for the cost of the war. The fortresses of the northern frontier were to be occupied by the Allies for five years, and the garrisons paid by France. All works of art requisitioned by Napoleon were to be restored to their owners." (Lieber and Boerner, English Political History, p. 166.) (e) Between Russia on the one hand and Turkey, Great Britain, France, and Sardinia on the other, March 30, 1856. Russia restored Kars, and ceded part of Bessarabia and the Danube mouth; Sebastopol was restored to Russia; the neutralization of the Black Sea was proclaimed; and Russia abandoned its claim to a protectorate over Christians in Turkey, to whom the sultan was to grant more favorable terms.

Paris, University of. The oldest of the European universities. Schools had been established here under the successors of Charlemagne. They multiplied rapidly, and in the year 1200 an edict of Philip Augustus united them under one management and created the University of Paris, called the Studium till 1250. More than 30 colleges were included. It degenerated, and was rehabilitated by Henry IV. in 1595. Under Louis XIV. the university did not share in the general revival of arts and letters. The Sorbonne, which was the Theology alone retaining its prestige. In fewer courses of lectures in French civil law were given for the first time. On Sept. 15, 1793, the faculties of theology, medicine, law, and arts were suppressed throughout the republic by the Convention. See Université Nationale de France.

Paris Garden. A circus for bull- and bear-baiting, on the Bankside, near the Globe Theatre, London. It is said to have derived its name from one De Paris who built a house there in the reign of Edward II. Parker, Joel. Born in New Jersey, Nov. 24, 1816: died 1888. An American politician, Democratic governor of New Jersey 1863–66 and 1872–1875.

Parker, John Henry. Born 1806: died Jan. 31, 1884. An English archæologist. He began as a bookseller in Oxford in 1830. In 1836 he published a "Glossary of Architecture," and in 1849 an "Introduction to the Study of Gothic Architecture, etc." His later years were devoted to explorations at Rome. His "Archæology of Rome" began to appear in 1873.

Parker, Matthew. Born at Norwich, England, Aug. 6, 1504: died at London, May 17, 1575. Archbishop of Canterbury. He graduated at Cambridge (Corpus Christi College) in 1524, and was appointed chaplain to Anne Boleyn in 1535, and dean of the College of St. Paul's Cross by Thomas Cromwell. In 1545 he was appointed vice-chancellor of Cambridge. On the accession of Mary he was deprived, and lost all his preferments. He was consecrated archbishop of Canterbury Dec. 17, 1559. As primate he devoted himself to the organization and discipline of the English Church, and was a firm opponent of puritanism.

Parker, Sir Peter. Born 1716: died 1811. An English admiral. He served in the American war, and made an unsuccessful attack on Fort Moultrie, Charleston harbor.

Parker, Sir Peter. Born 1786: died 1814. An English naval officer, engaged in the blockading of Chesapeake Bay in 1814.

Parker, Theodore. Born at Lexington, Mass., Aug. 24, 1810: died at Florence, Italy, May 10, 1860. A noted American clergyman, lecturer, reformer, and writer. He studied at the Cambridge Divinity School 1834–36; became a Unitarian clergyman at Roxbury, Massachusetts, in 1837; became the head of an independent rationalistic society at the Melodeon (1846), and later at the Music Hall, Boston; and was a conspicuous advocate of the abolition of slavery. Among his works are "Discourse on Matters Pertaining to Religion" (1842), "Sermons of Theism, Atheism, and the Popular Theology" (1853), "Ten Sermons of Religion" (1853), besides a large number of addresses, etc., and "Great Americans" (this was published after his death). His complete works were edited by F. P. Cobbe (12 vols. 1863–65).

Parker, Willard. Born in New Hampshire, Sept. 2, 1800: died at New York, April 25, 1884. An American surgeon, professor of surgery in the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, 1839–69, and later professor of clinical surgery there. He became president of the New York State Medical Society at Binghamton in 1865. He published various medical monographs.

Parker, Sir William. Born 1781: died 1866. An English admiral. He commanded the fleet operating against China in 1841, and effected the treaty of Nanking.

Parkersburg (pär'kėrz-bėrg). A city, capital of Wood County, West Virginia, situated on the Ohio 73 miles southwest of Wheeling. It is the second city in the State in leading industry, the refining of petroleum. Population (1890), 8,408.

Parkman (pärk'man), Francis. Born at Boston, Sept. 16, 1823: died at Jamaica Plain, near Boston, Nov. 8, 1893. An American historian. He graduated at Harvard in 1844, and began the study of law, but ultimately abandoned this study in order to devote himself to literature. He was professor of horticulture in the agricultural school of Harvard 1871–72. His historical works include "Conspiracy of Pontiac" (1851), "Pioneers of France in the New World" (1865), "Jesuits in North America" (1867), "Discovery of the Great West" (1869), "The Old Régime in Canada" (1874), "Count Frontenac and New France under Louis XIV." (1877), "Montcalm and Wolfe" (1884), "A Half Century of Conflict" (1892). He wrote also "The California and Oregon Trail" (1849), "Vassall Morton," a novel (1856), and "Historic Handbook of the Northern Tour" (1885).

Park Range. A chain of the Rocky Mountains in Colorado, west of South Park. Mount Lincoln is 14,297 feet in height.

Parley (pär'li). Peter. The pseudonym of Samuel Griswold Goodrich: it has also been used by others.

Parliament (par'li-ment). The supreme legislative body of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. It consists of the three estates of the realm—namely, the lords spiritual, the lords temporal, and the commons: the general council of the nation, constituting the legislature, summoned by the sovereign's authority to consult on the affairs of the nation and to enact and repeal laws. Primarily, the sovereign may be considered as a constituent element of Parliament: but the word as generally used has exclusive reference to the three estates above named, ranged in two distinct branches—the House of Lords and the House of Commons. The House of Lords (numbering 560 at the end of 1893) includes the lords spiritual (26) and lords temporal (534). The House of Commons consists at present (1894) of 670 members: 495 for England and Wales, 72 for Scotland, and 103 for Ireland—377 being representatives of county constituencies (counties or divisions of counties), 284 of boroughs, and 9 of universities. The authority of Parliament extends over the United Kingdom and all its colonies and foreign possessions. The duration of a Parliament was fixed by the Septennial Act in 1716 (superseding the Triennial Act of 1694) at 7 years, but it seldom even approaches its limit. Sessions are held annually, usually from about the middle of Feb. to the end of Aug., and are closed by prorogation. The government is administered by the ministry, which is sustained by a majority in the House of Commons. Should the ministry be outvoted in the house on a question of vital importance, it either resigns office or dissolves Parliament and appeals to the country. The precursors of the Parliament were the Witenagemot in the Anglo-Saxon period, and the National Councils in the Norman and Angevin periods. The composition and powers of Parliament were developed in the 14th and 15th centuries. The right of representation from shires and towns dates from 1265, and the separation of the two houses dates from the middle of the 14th century. Parliamentary government was in large measure suspended from 1461 to the middle of the reign of Henry VII. Profound struggles between the Parliament and the crown took place under James I. and Charles I., which led to the civil war and the Commonwealth. The parliamentary subjects to vote in the election of members of Parliament has been extended and regulated by the Reform Acts of 1832, 1867, and 1884, and the Redistribution Act of 1885.

Parliament Houses of. The buildings occupied for legislative purposes by the British Parliament, at Westminster, London. They were begun in 1840 from plans by Barry. The style is ornate late Perpendicular: the area 8 acres. The structure comprises 11 courts, some of large size, 1,100 rooms, and 100 stairways. The Thames front is 940 feet long, with low square towers at the extremities and flanking the raised central portion. The square Victoria tower at the southwest angle is 340 feet high; the middle tower, and the pointed Clock-tower at the north end, are slightly less lofty. The House of Commons is toward the north end of the great structure: it measures 75 by 45 feet and 41 high, and is solidly and simply furnished, and paneled with oak. There are 12 windows of colored glass. The House of Lords, 90 by 45 feet and 45 high, is very richly decorated. The walls are adorned with historical frescos. Among other notable rooms are the Central Hall, between the House of Lords and the House of Commons, octagonal, richly and highly ornamented; and the queen's robing-room and the royal gallery, used by the sovereign when she opens or prorogues Parliament in person. St. Stephen's Hall affords communication between the Central Hall and Westminster Hall on the west. About 500 statues, inside and outside, adorn the buildings.

Parliament, Mad. (So named in derision by the partizans of Henry III.) A great council held at Oxford in 1258 in order to accommodate the differences which had arisen between the barons and the king, owing to the persistent evasion by the latter of the obligations imposed on the sovereign by Magna Charta. It enacted the Provisions of Oxford, requiring the faithful observance by the king of the Great Charter, and providing for the assembling of a Parliament three times a year, and regular control over the chief justiciar, chancellor, and other high officers.

Parliament, The Rump. See Long Parliament.

Parliament of Bats ('bludgeons'). A Parliament under Henry VI., 1426.

Orders had been sent to the members that they should not wear swords, so they came like modern butchers, with long staves. When these were prohibited they had recourse to stones and leaden plummets.

Gardon, Hist. of Parliament.

Parliament of Dunces. A parliament convened at Coventry by Henry IV. in 1404: so named because all lawyers were excluded from it. Also called the Unlearned Parliament and the Lack-learning Parliament.

Parliament of Fowls, or Assembly of Fowls. A poem by Chaucer, mostly taken from Italian sources. Sixteen of the 98 stanzas are from Boccaccio's "Teseide." It is a poetical abstract of Cicero's "Dream of Scipio."

Parliament of Love, The. A play by Massinger, licensed in 1624.

Parliament of Paris. The chief of the French parliaments; the principal tribunal of justice of the French monarchy, from its origin in the king's council at a very early date to the Revolution. From about 1300 the parliament was constituted in 3 divisions—the grand' chambre, the chambre des requêtes, and the chambre des enquêtes. It played a prominent political part at different times in the 17th and 18th centuries.

Parma (pär'mä). 1. A province in the compartimento of Emilia, Italy. Area, 1,250 square miles. Population (1891), 271,621.—2. A city, capital of the province of Parma, Italy, situated on the river Parma in lat. 44° 48′ N., long. 10° 20′ E.: the Roman Parma. It is the seat of a flourishing trade, and has manufactures of felt hats. The cathedral is an interesting Romanesque building, essentially of the 11th century. The façade has 3 round-arched portals below 3 tiers of arcades; arcades are freely and picturesquely used throughout the exterior. There is an octagonal domed tower at the crossing. The three-aisled interior is spacious, with much excellent sculpture and painting, notably the famous frescos by Correggio in the dome, representing the Assumption of the Virgin. The baptistery of the cathedral, one of the finest in Italy, began in 1196, is octagonal, with 7 stories: the 4 intermediate ones form galleries supported by little columns, closely set. There are 3 beautiful sculptured doors. The interior is sixteen-sided, with arcades and a pointed, ribbed dome. The walls are covered with curious medieval paintings, and there is much good sculpture both without and within. Other objects of interest are the churches of Madonna della Steccata and San Giovanni Evangelista, ducal palace, library, museum, art gallery, and university. Parma was founded by the Romans as a colony on the Æmilian Way about 183 B. C. After its capture by Mark Antony, it was restored and called Colonia Julia Augusta. It had important woolen manufactures in early times. It took part in the strife of the Guelphs and Ghibellines, and belonged later to the Visconti. Here, in 1734, an indecisive battle was fought between the French and the Imperialists. (See Parma, Duchy of.) Population (1892), 51,590.

Parma, Duchy of, properly the Duchies of Parma and Piacenza. A former duchy in northern Italy, comprising in later times the modern provinces of Parma and Piacenza. It was obtained by the popacy in 1515; was under the Farnese dynasty from 1545 to 1731; passed to Don Carlos (Bourbon of Spain) in 1731, to Austria in 1735, to Don Philip (Bourbon of Spain) in 1748; and was annexed to France in 1802. The duchies of Parma, Piacenza, and Guastalla were given to Maria Louisa by the Congress of Vienna in 1814–15, and fell to the Duke of Lucca in 1847. There was an unsuccessful revolution in 1848–49. The duchy was incorporated with the kingdom of Italy in 1860.

Parma, Duke of (Alexander). See Farnese, Alessandro.

Parmegiano, or Parmeggiano. See Parmigiano.

Parmelan (pärm-lon′). A mountain near Annecy, in the Alps of Savoy. Height, 6,085 feet.

Parmenides (pär-men′i-dēz). [Gr. Παρμενίδης.] Born at Elea: fl. about 450 B. C. (according to some 500 B. C.?). A celebrated Greek philosopher, head of the Eleatic school. He wrote his opinions in a didactic poem, "Nature" (fragments edited by Karsten and by Stein). His central thought is the unity and permanence of being: there is no real birth or change. A celebrated dialogue of Plato was named from him.

Parmenides, a native of Elea, who flourished about the year 503 B. C., enjoyed a reputation in his native city scarcely inferior to that of Pythagoras at Crotona, of Empedocles at Acragas, or of Solon at Athens. Speusippus, quoted by Diogenes Laertius, asserts that the magistrates of Elea were yearly sworn to observe the laws enacted by Parmenides. Cebes talks about a "Pythagorean or Parmenidean mode of life," as if the austere ascesis of the Samian philosopher had been adopted or imitated by the Eleatic.
Symonds, Studies of the Greek Poets, I. 193.

Parmenio (pär-mē′ni-ō), or Parmenion (pär-mē′ni-on). [Gr. Παρμενίων.] Born about 400 B. C.: assassinated by order of Alexander, 330 B. C. A Macedonian general. He was the leading councilor and general of Philip and Alexander the Great, and commanded the left wing at the battles of Granicus, Issus, and Arbela.

Parmigiano (pär-mē-jä′nō), or Parmegiano (pär-mā-jä′nō), Il (The Parmesan″): usual name of Francesco Maria Mazzuola (mät-sō-ō′lä) (Mazzola, or Mazzuoli). Born at Parma, Jan. 11, 1504: died at Casal Maggiore, Italy, Aug. 24, 1540. An Italian painter. Among his works are "Vision of St. Jerome" (National Gallery, London), "Madonna with St. Margaret" (Bologna), "Madonna del Collo Lungo" (Pitti Palace, Florence), "Madonna della Rosa" (Dresden Gallery), etc.

Parnahyba. See Paranahyba.

Parnassus (pär-nas′us). [Gr. Παρνασσός, later Παρνασσός.] A mountain-ridge in Greece, 83 miles northwest of Athens, near the ancient Delphi, and situated mainly in ancient Phocis, the modern Liakoura. It was celebrated as the haunt of Apollo, the Muses, and the nymphs, and hence as the seat of music and poetry. Highest summit, Lycoreia (8,068 feet).

Parnassus, 1. A fresco by Raphael Mengs (1760), in the Villa Albani, Rome. It is a group of Apollo and the Muses, with Mnemosyne, the mother of the Muses. 2. A fresco by Raphael, in the Stanza della Segnatura of the Vatican, Rome. The subject is the triumph of ancient art under the enlightened and poetic influences of the Renaissance. Apollo and the Muses preside: Homer, Vergil, Dante, Sappho, Anacreon, Petrarch, and Corinna, with Raphael himself, figure with their fellow-artists in the attendant company. It is a garden festival of 16th-century Rome.

Parnassus, Mount. A painting by Mantegna, in the Louvre, Paris. Mars and Venus stand on a rock-arch, with Cupid, who is shooting darts into Vulcan's cave: in the foreground the Muses dance while Apollo makes music, and Mercury stands beside Pegasus.

Parnell (pär′nel), Charles Stewart. Born at Avondale, County Wicklow, Ireland, 1846: died at Brighton, Oct. 6, 1891. An Irish statesman. He was the fourth son of John Henry Parnell (whose ancestors emigrated from England to Ireland in the 17th century) and Delia Tudor Stewart, daughter of Admiral Charles Stewart of the United States navy. He studied at Magdalene College, Cambridge, without taking a degree, and was elected to Parliament in 1875. He became the first president of the Irish Land League in 1879, visited the United States in the interest of the Irish agitation for home rule 1879–80, and succeeded Shaw as leader of the Home Rule party in 1880. He was imprisoned under the Coercion Act 1881–82. In 1885 Mr. Gladstone formed a parliamentary alliance with Parnell, and proposed a Home Rule Bill which secured the support of all the Irish members (86) but caused a split in the Liberal party and restored Lord Salisbury to power. Toward the close of the session of 1887 the "Times" sought to discredit home rule before the country by publishing a series of articles entitled "Parnellism and Crime," in which it tried to connect Parnell with the Phœnix Park murders and other assassinations. In support of its allegations it published a number of letters alleged to have been written by Parnell, which were proved, before a committee appointed by Parliament to investigate the "Times" charges, to have been forged by Pigott. Parnell brought suit for libel against the "Times," recovering £5,000 damages. In 1890, Captain O'Shea obtained a grant of divorce from his wife—Parnell (who afterward married Mrs. O'Shea) having been cited as the corespondent in the suit. He was in consequence deposed from the leadership, at the instance of the liberal leaders, by a majority of his party, but refused to submit, and died a bankrupt and his death.

Parnell, Henry Brooke, first Baron Congleton. Born July 3, 1776: committed suicide, June 8, 1842. A British politician, secretary at war 1830–32. He wrote "Financial Reform" (1830), etc.

Parnell, Thomas. Born at Dublin in 1679: died in 1717. A British poet. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, entered in Holy Orders, ordained in 1700; was archdeacon of Clogher in 1705; and was presented to the vicarage of Finglas in 1716. He was a member of the Scriblerus Club. Among his poems are "The Hermit," "The Night-Piece on Death," "Hymn to Contentment," and "Allegory on Man." He translated Homer's "Battle of the Frogs and Mice."

Parnellite (pär′nel-it) Party. In British politics, the Irish Nationalist party as it reunited under the leadership of Parnell about 1879. Its only important aim was the securing of home rule for Ireland. In 1885 it became allied for this purpose with the English Liberal party, and contributed to the parliamentary majority of the third and fourth Gladstone administrations. On the death of Parnell in 1891 the party divided, a small fraction of it, called now distinctively the Parnellites, being led by John Redmond, while the great majority of the Nationalists (often called Anti-Parnellites) chose Justin M'Carthy as leader.

Parny (pär-nē′), Évariste Désiré de Forges, vicomte de. Born on the Isle of Bourbon, Feb. 6, 1753: died at Paris, Dec. 5, 1814. A French poet. Among his best-known works are "Poésies érotiques" (1778) and "La guerre des dieux" (1799).

Parny's best piece, a short epitaph on a young girl, is one of the best things of its kind in literature. His merits, however, are confined to his early work. In his maturer years he wrote long poems, on the model of the "Pucelle," against England, Christianity, and monarchism, which are equally remarkable for blasphemy, obscenity, extravagance, and dullness. Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 390.

Parolles (pä-rol′es). A character in Shakspere's "All's Well that Ends Well," a braggart whose poltroonery is humorous and droll.

Paropamisus (par-ō-pam′i-sus or par-ō-pa-mī′sus). [Gr. Παροπάμισος.] In ancient geography, a mountain-range lying west of the Hindu-Kush.

Paros (pā′ros). [Gr. Πάρος.] An island of the Cyclades, Greece, situated in the Ægean Sea west of Naxos, intersected by lat. 37° N., long. 25° 10′ E. It is composed of a single mountain, famous in ancient times for its marble. It was successfully attacked by Miltiades after the battle of Marathon 490 B. C., and joined the confederacy of Delos. Length, 13 miles.

Parquet, Jacques Diel du. See Diel du Parquet.

Parr (pär), Catharine. Born at Kendal Castle, Westmoreland, England, about 1513: died at Sudely Castle, Gloucestershire, England, Sept. 7, 1548. Eighth wife of Henry VIII., whom she married in 1543. She married Lord Seymour in 1547.

Parr, Samuel. Born at Harrow-on-the-Hill, England, Jan. 15, 1747: died at Hatton, March 6, 1825. An English scholar, son of Samuel Parr, a surgeon, whose assistant he was 1761–65. He studied at Harrow, and was at Cambridge for a short time in 1765. From 1767 to 1771 he was chief assistant to Dr. Sumner at Harrow School, and in 1783 was made vicar of Hatton, near Warwick. He was a warm friend of Person. He was famous for the variety of his knowledge and for his dogmatism.

Parr, Thomas, called "Old Parr." Died at London, 1635. A reputed centenarian. He was said to have been born in 1483, and hence would have been 152 years old when he died. Mr. Thoms, the editor of "Notes and Queries," examined the evidence and found it untrustworthy, though Parr was certainly very old and was a celebrity for many years before his death.

Parramatta, or Paramatta (par-a-mat′ä). A town in New South Wales, Australia, situated on the Parramatta River 14 miles northwest of Sydney. It has a flourishing fruit trade. Population (1891), 11,677.

Parret (par′et). A river in Somerset, England, which flows into the Bristol Channel 6 miles north of Bridgwater. Length, about 40 miles.

Parrhasius (pa-rā′shi-us). [Gr. Παρράσιος.] Born at Ephesus: lived about 400 B. C. A celebrated Greek painter, considered one of the greatest of antiquity. The anecdotes of Pliny about all the painters of this time indicate extraordinary realism carried to the point of mannerism. (Compare Zeuxis.) There were many pen-and-ink sketches by Parrhasius still in existence in the time of Pliny. Among his principal works were "The Personifications of the Deme of Athens," probably suggested by Aristophanes; a Prometheus; the Heroides at Lindus; the Theseus at Athens, afterward on the Capitol at Rome; and a Contest of Ajax and Odysseus for the weapons of Achilles.

Parris (par′is), Albion Keith. Born in Maine, Jan. 19, 1788: died at Portland, Maine, Feb. 11, 1857. An American Democratic politician. He was member of Congress from Massachusetts 1815–19; governor of Maine 1827–36, and United States senator from Maine 1836–28.

Parris, Samuel. Born at London, 1653: died at Sudbury, Mass., Feb. 27, 1720. An American Congregational clergyman, notable in connection with the Salem witchcraft delusion of 1692–93. He studied at Harvard, without taking a degree, became a merchant at Boston, afterward entered the ministry, and in 1689 became pastor of the church at Danvers (then part of Salem), Massachusetts. In 1692 his daughter and Abigail Williams, both under 12 years of age, accused Tituba (a South American slave living with the family as a servant) of bewitching them. At best Tituba into confessing herself a witch. The delusion spread, many persons were tried for witchcraft, and in the course of 16 months 20 persons were put to death. He was dismissed by his congregation in 1696 for his share in these judicial murders. Appletons' Cyc. of Amer. Biog.

Parrot (pä-rō′), Johann Jakob Friedrich Wilhelm. Born at Karlsruhe, Baden, 1792: died at Dorpat, Russia, about 1840. A German traveler in the Caucasus, Ararat, etc.

Parrott (par′ot). Robert Parker. Born at Lee, N. H., Oct. 5, 1804: died at Cold Spring, N. Y., Dec. 24, 1877. An American inventor, superintendent of the West Point iron and cannon foundry, Cold Spring, New York. He invented the Parrott gun.

Parry (par′i), Cape. A cape on the northern coast of North America, projecting into the Arctic Ocean about lat. 70° N., long. 123° 30′ W.

Parry, Charles Hubert Hastings. Born at Bournemouth, Feb. 27, 1848. An English composer. He was made professor of musical history and composition at the Royal Academy of Music in 1883.

Parry, Sir William Edward. Born at Bath, England, Dec. 19, 1790: died at Ems, Germany, July 8, 1855. An English navigator and arctic explorer. In 1806 he was midshipman in the Tribune frigate, and in 1808 on the Vanguard in the Baltic. As lieutenant of the Alexander he served at Spitzbergen and on La Hogue in the North American station until 1817. He accompanied Ross's polar expedition, and took command of an expedition himself in May, 1819. He explored and named Barrow Strait, Prince Regent's Inlet, and Wellington Sound, reaching Melville Island Sept., 1819. By crossing long. 110° W. he won the £5,000 prize offered by Parliament. A navigation polar expedition appeared in 1821. In May, 1821, he started on a second expedition, and in May, 1824, on a third, which were not specially successful. Another expedition, by way of Spitzbergen, was likewise unsuccessful. From Dec., 1823, to May, 1829, he was acting hydrographer to the navy. In 1852 he was made rear-admiral, and in 1853 governor of Greenwich Hospital.

Parry Islands. [Named from Sir W. E. Parry.] A group of islands in the Arctic Ocean, including Melville Island, Bathurst Island, and others.

Parsifal, or Parsival (pär′sē-fäl). A musical drama by Richard Wagner. The poem was composed by him in 1877, the music in 1879. It was first performed at Bayreuth, July 28, 1882. See Perceval and Parzival.

Parsis, or Parsees (pär′sēz). [From Pers. Parsi, a Persian.] The descendants of those Persians who settled in India about the end of the 7th and the beginning of the 8th century, in order to escape Mohammedan persecution, and who still retain their ancient religion, now called Zoroastrianism. See Guebers.

Parsons (pär'sonz). A city in Labette County, southeastern Kansas, 125 miles south by east of Topeka. Population (1890), 16,796.

Parsons (pär'sonz), Alfred William. Born in Somerset, Dec. 2, 1847. An English landscape-painter. He first exhibited at the Royal Academy in 1871, and paints both in oil and in water-colors. Among his works are "The First Frost" (1883); "In Ober Country" (1885); "When Nature Painted all Things Gay" (1887); a series of water-color drawings of the Warwickshire Avon (exhibited in 1885), etc.

Parsons, or Persons (pėr'sons), Robert. Born at Nether Stowey, Somerset, 1546; died at Rome, April 18, 1610. An English Jesuit. He graduated at Oxford in the Oxford Univ. list, and was subsequently a fellow, bursar, and dean of his college. In 1575 he entered the Jesuit society at Rome. He intrigued actively against Elizabeth and the Protestants in England until his death. He published many polemical works.

Parsons, Theophilus. Born at Byfield, Mass., Feb. 24, 1750; died at Boston, Oct. 30, 1813. An American jurist. He was a member of the Essex Junto in 1775, and chief justice of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts 1806–13.

Parthenius (pär-thē'ni-us). [Gr. Παρθένιος.] Lived in the last part of the 1st century B. C. A Greek poet, living in Rome. His only surviving work is a collection of prose tales.

Parthenon (pär'the-non). [Gr. Παρθενών, the temple of Athene Parthenos ('the Virgin').] The official temple of Pallas, at Athens, as protectress of the city and guardian of the Athenian hegemony, begun about 450 B. C. by Ictinus, under the political direction of Pericles and the artistic presidency of Phidias. The temple is a Doric peripteros of 8 by 17 columns, on a stylobate of 3 steps, measuring on the highest step 101 by 228 feet. Before both pronaos and opisthodomos there is an inner range of 6 columns. The cella had two interior doubletiered ranges of Doric columns, and behind it there was a large chamber used for a treasury, with 4 great columns to support its ceiling. The cult-statue in the cella was the famous colossal chryselephantine statue of Athene Parthenos by Phidias. It represented the goddess standing, wearing helmet and ægis, with her left hand supporting her spear, and on her extended right holding a Victory. At her feet were her shield and serpent. The entire upper part of the exterior wall of the cella was surrounded by a frieze in low relief, 3 feet high, representing an idealized Panathenaic procession in presence of the Olympian gods. Both pediments were filled with sculpture in the round, the group on the east representing the birth of Athene, that on the west her contest for Attens with Poseidon. The surviving fragments from the pediments and much of the frieze are among the Elgin Marbles in the British Museum, and are considered the most precious existing sculptures. The metopes of the peristyle entablature bore contests of Greeks with centaurs, Amazons, and Trojans, in high relief. The ornament of the Parthenon also included a comprehensive scheme of decoration in color. In refinement of design and execution, this structure stands unrivaled and unparalleled. Since 1835 it has not been disputed that the existing Parthenon stands on the foundations of an older temple which, prior to the discovery in 1885 of the old temple of Athene (see Athena) adjoining the Erechtheum, was believed to be identical with this temple. In 1892 Mr. F. C. Penrose sought to establish, nevertheless, that the old temple, having his agreement primarily on a series of architect's laying-out marks inscribed on the north wall of the Parthenon. Mr. Penrose's temple, assigned to the beginning of the 6th century B. C., was Doric, peripteral, hexastyle, with 16 columns on the flanks, measuring on the highest step 69 by 193.1 feet, and likewise incorporated as a pedestal a considerable part of its massive platform. Dr. Dörpfeld, however, has traversed successfully the English archeologist's theory, and has proved that the older Parthenon was never finished; that it was Doric, peripteral, hexastyle, with 19 columns on the flanks, on a stylobate probably of 2 steps; and that it measured on the edge of the upper step 100.04 by 249.24 feet.

Parthenope (pär-then'ō-pē). [Gr. Παρθενόπη.] 1. The name of several persons in Greek mythology, particularly of a Siren said to have been cast up drowned on the shore of Naples. —2. An ancient name of Naples.—3. An asteroid (No. 11) discovered at Naples May 11, 1850, by De Gasparis.

Parzival (pärt'sė-fäl). The legendary hero of the epic poem of the same name written by the German poet Wolfram von Eschenbach, after French originals, between 1205 and 1215. He was the son of Gamuret, prince of Anjou, and Queen Herzeloide of Valois. His father died in battle in the East, and his mother, to protect him from a like fate, brings him up in the solitude of the forest in ignorance of knightly customs. After many misadventures he becomes knight at Arthur's court, and ultimately becomes a knight of the Round Table. Afterward, in search of adventures, he rescues Queen Condwiramurs, who becomes his wife, and then arrives at the Castle of the Holy Grail. Here, having neglected certain conditions, he loses the sovereignty of the grail (which it was possible for him to obtain), and leaves the castle in disgrace. The messenger of the grail afterward appears at the court of Arthur and rebukes him, and he is banished from the Round Table. At this open shame he renounces his allegiance to God, and wanders about in search of the grail. Finally he learns the true nature of God and of the grail, leads a life of abstinence, and becomes again a member of the Round Table. At the Castle of the Grail he is declared to be now worthy to become the sovereign of the grail. See Parsifal and Perceval.

Pascal (pas'kal; F. pron. päs-käl'), Blaise. Born at Clermont-Ferrand, Puy-de-Dôme, June 19, 1623; died at Paris, Aug. 19, 1662. A celebrated French geometrician, philosopher, and writer. He was educated in Paris after 1631, but his progress was such that his zeal had to be restrained. Books were denied him in his public, but his overflowing, unaided, he invented geometry anew when 12 years old, and at the age of 17 achieved renown with his "Traité des sections coniques" (1640). Later on he undertook and carried on successfully the subtle experiments on the Torricellian void; but he also became distinguished in literature is due to his connection with the celebrated monastery of Port-Royal. At different times during his early years Pascal had conceived the plan to give himself up as a layman to the service of God. At various times he abandoned his intention for a life of dissipation from which he was finally redeemed as a consequence of an escape he had from an accident (1654). He renounced the world definitely, and embraced the cause of Port-Royal. His writings during these walls was transmitted from memory by an amitor, and is entitled "Entretien sur Epictète et Montaigne" (1655). He rose to highest literary excellence in setting forth and defending the doctrines of Port-Royal against the Jesuits. Between Jan., 1656, and March, 1657, over his nom de plume, Louis de Montalte, Pascal wrote 18 letters, professedly to a friend in the provinces; hence the epistles are known as "Les provinciales." At the time of his death Pascal was engaged on a work that he was to name "Apologie de la religion chrétienne." The notes he had made for it were subsequently found, but in such a scattered and imperfect condition that it was useless to attempt restoring his plan. They were therefore published in 1670 under the title "Pensées de M. Pascal sur la religion et sur quelques autres sujets, qui ont été trouvées après sa mort parmi ses papiers." In addition to these works Pascal wrote "Discours sur les passions de l'amour," "L'Esprit géométrique," "L'Art de persuader," three different "Discours sur la condition des grands," "Prière pour demander le bon usage des maladies," and finally a limited number of letters, addressed among others, to Mademoiselle de Roannez in 1657.

The last action fought there was in 1882, when nearly all the able-bodied men of Galeana were slain by a superior force of Indians, after a desperate resistance.

Paso del Norte (pä'sō del nōr'tā). El. [Sp., 'The Pass of the North.'] A town (now Ciudad Juarez) in northeastern Chihuahua, Mexico, on the west bank of the Rio Grande opposite El Paso in Texas. It was founded as an Indian mission in 1659. Until 1680 it was only an Indian village, and the only relay between Parral in southern Chihuahua and Santa Fé in New Mexico. In 1680, when the Pueblo Indians in New Mexico drove the Spaniards from Santa Fé, the retreating colonists and a few soldiers halted at El Paso del Norte, and established their camp. Thereafter it became the seat of government for the province of New Mexico until 1822, and the base of operations against the hostile Pueblos. A Spanish town gradually arose, and the Indian settlements became established in that place in the course of time. It remained attached to New Mexico until after the war between the United States and Mexico, when it was, after the conclusion of peace, included in the Mexican state of Chihuahua. During the latter part of the reign of Maximilian, El Paso del Norte formed the headquarters of the national forces and of President Juarez. The Mexican Central Railroad has there its northern terminus. Population, about 8,000.

He retired to private life after the revolution of 1848. He was the joint author with M. de Rancon of a vaudeville, "Grimot, ou le portrait à faire"; published "Discours prononcés dans les chambres législatives de 1814–30" (1842); and left a memoir in manuscript, the first volume of which appeared in 1893 under the title of "Histoire de mon temps."

Pasquin (pas'kwin), It. Pasquino (päs-kwē'nō), [F. pasquin, a lampoon, also the statue so called (Cotgrave), from It. pasquino, a lampoon.] A tailor (or a cobbler, or a barber) who lived about the end of the 15th century in Rome, noted for his caustic wit, and whose name, soon after his death, was transferred to a mutilated statue which had been dug up opposite his shop, on which were posted anonymous lampoons. At the opposite end of the city from the statue mentioned above, there was an ancient statue of Mars, called by the people Marforio; and gibes and jeers pasted upon Pasquin were answered by similar effusions on the part of Marforio. By this system of thrust and parry the most serious matters were disclosed, and the most distinguished persons attacked and defended. I. D'Israeli.

Passage of Honor. See the extract.

The last [of these special chronicles], according to the date of its events, is the "Paso Honroso," or the Passage of Honor, and is a formal account of a passage at arms which was held against all comers in 1434, at the bridge of Orbigo, near the city of Leon, during thirty days, at a moment when the road was thronged with knights passing for a solemn festival to the neighboring shrine of Santiago. The challenger was Suero de Quiñones, a gentleman of rank, who claimed to be thus emancipated from the service of wearing for a noble lady's sake a chain of iron around his neck every Thursday. The arrangements for this extraordinary tournament were all made under the king's authority. Nine champions, maîtres de jeux, were to hold stout lances, and at the end of thirty days it was found that sixty-eight knights had run a course in the usual manner; his claim that six hundred and twenty-seven encounters had taken place, and that sixty-six lances had been broken by one knight, an Aragonese, having been killed, and many wounded, among whom were Quiñones and eight out of the nine fellow-champions. Ticknor, Span. Lit., I. 374.

Passages from the Diary of a Late Physician. A collection of short stories by Samuel Warren, first published in "Blackwood's Magazine." In 1831 in America (1832 in England) two volumes were published, and in 1838 a third was added. They last mostly a morbid interest, but were extremely popular.

Patagonia (pat-a-gō'ni-ā). The southernmost portion of South America, including all of the Argentine Republic south of the Rio Negro, together with the adjacent parts of Chile. The western parts traversed from north to south by the Andes; east of them much of the country is occupied by highland more or less arid plains. The shores of the Chilean portion are bordered by an archipelago of islands. The interior is sparsely populated by Indians (Patagonians, Araucanians, etc.), but there are now flourishing Argentine and Chilean settlements along the coasts. In 1884 Patagonia was divided by treaty, Chile taking the western and southern shores, together with the shores of the strait of Magellan from lat. 52° S., and the Argentine Republic retaining all the rest. Both portions have been subdivided into territories and provinces. The name is now used only as a convenient geographical term, and is commonly restricted to the Argentine portion; Tierra del Fuego is sometimes included. Total area (excluding Tierra del Fuego), about 285,000 square miles, of which about one fifth is in Chile. Population, about 40,000.

Patagonians (pat-a-gō'ni-ąnz). The principal Indian race of Patagonia. They call themselves Chonek, Tzoneca, or Inaken, the Pampean Indians, and hence the whites of Argentina, use them the general designation of Tehuel-hes, or southern people, a name more particularly applied to those living on the rivers Chubut and Santa Cruz. They are wandering hunters, their small villages being frequently changed, at present they are friendly to the whites, bringing skins, etc., to sell at the settlements. The Patagonians are noted for their great stature, many of the men being over six feet high: the early explorers represented them as giants. Their language indicates a distinct stock, though Martius believed that it had some relation to that of the Tapuyas of Brazil. They number about 20,000.

Patala (pä-tä'la). [Skt. pātāla, a word of obscure derivation.] In Hindu mythology, a subterranean or infernal region, more properly, the name of one of its seven subregions or stories, supposed to be inhabited by various classes of supernatural beings, especially Nāgas, or serpents. Paterson, William. Born in Dumfriesshire, April, 1658; died in 1719. A Scotch adventurer. It is said that he spent many years with the buccaneers. In 1695 the Scottish Parliament authorized him, with others, to plant colonies, and a charter was obtained from William III. A company was formed to settle the Isthmus of Darien (called in the charter "Caledonia"); the stock was taken up in a spirit of wild speculation, and thousands volunteered as colonists. Paterson sailed from Leith July 26, 1698, with 1,200 men; landed on the Isthmus; and founded the settlement of New St. Andrew, at the port of Acla. After terrible sufferings it was abandoned on June 22, 1699, and Paterson became for a time insane. Other colonists, to the number of 1,600, who had not heard of the disaster, arrived later: they were attacked by the Spaniards, capitulated after a siege of six weeks (March 31, 1700), and were allowed to leave the country, but very few ever reached home.

Pausanias (pâ-sā'ni-as). [Gr. Παυσανίας.] Died in Sparta after 466 B. C. A Spartan general, son of Cleombrotus. He commanded at the victory of Platæa in 479; continued the war against Persia in 478; conducted a treasonable correspondence with Xerxes; and was starved to death by order of the ephors as a punishment for his treason.

Pausanias. Lived in the 2d century. A noted Greek geographer and writer on art. He wrote a "Periegesis of Greece," devoted to a description of Grecian antiquities.

Pausanias, who is generally known as "the cicerone and tourist," and whose work, "the gazetteer of Hellas," is our best repertory of information for the topography, local history, religious observances, architecture, and sculpture of the different states of Greece. Of the personal history of Pausanias we know nothing. It has been inferred, from his reference to Pelops as having dwelt "with us," that he was a native of Lydia; and there is evidence to show that he had lived long near Mount Sipylus. Passages in his work prove that he was a contemporary of Hadrian and the Antonines.

Pausias (pâ'shi-as). [Gr. Παυσίας.] Lived in the middle of the 4th century B. C. A Greek painter of Sicyon, a pupil of Pamphilus and a contemporary of Apelles. He made a special study of foreshortening, and was the first to paint ceilings. A large picture of a sacrifice was famous for a big black ox directly foreshortened. A famous picture was the "Sacrificing Boy" of Sophanopolis, painted from Glycera the flower girl of Sicyon. He was especially attracted by the possibilities of encaustic, and developed it to a high degree of perfection. Several of these wax pictures were taken to Rome by Scaurus. Their technical refinement and cleverness seem to have had a special attraction for the later Romans.

Pauw (pou), Cornelius de. Born at Amsterdam, 1739; died at Xanten, duchy of Cleves, July 7, 1799. A Dutch author. He joined the order of Franciscans, but devoted most of his life to literary work, residing at Xanten. He published "Recherches philosophiques sur les Américains" (2 vols., 1768–70; enlarged editions, 1770 and 1774), "Recherches philosophiques sur les Egyptiens et les Chinois" (1774), and "Recherches philosophiques sur les Grecs" (1778). A collected edition of his writings was published at Paris, 1795, and there is an English translation of the first one. De Pauw's works are characterized by a spirit of criticism which would be valuable if it were less violent. His views excited much controversy.

Pauwels (pou'ĕls), Ferdinand. Born at Eeckeren, near Antwerp, April 13, 1830. A Belgian historical painter.

Pavement of Martyrs, The. See the extract, descriptive of the battle near Tours.

Charles cut through the ranks of the Moslems with irresistible might, dealing right and left such vehement blows that from that day he was called Charles Martel, 'Karl of the Hammer.' His Frankish followers, inspired by their leader's prowess, bore down upon the Saracens with crushing force; and the whole array of the Moslems broke and fled in utter rout. The spot was long and shudderingly known in Andalusia by the name of the "Pavement of Martyrs." Foulke, 'Story of the Moors,' p. 59.

Pedro I. (Dom Antonio Pedro de Alcantara Bourbon.) Born at Lisbon, Oct. 12, 1798: died there, Sept. 24, 1834. First emperor of Brazil. He was the second son of Don João, who became John VI. of Portugal in 1816; and by the death of his elder brother, was his apparent. In 1807 he was taken to Brazil with the royal family. His father resumed the throne in 1821, and returned to Portugal April 26, 1821, leaving Dom Pedro as regent of Brazil. Early in 1822 the prince assumed the leadership of the party in opposition to Portugal, declaratively pronounced for independence Sept. 7, and was proclaimed emperor Oct. 12 and crowned Dec. 1. The only serious resistance made by Portugal was in the northern provinces, and that was overcome. In 1825 Portugal recognized the independence of Brazil. The popularity of the emperor, at first very great, was weakened by his reactionary policy in 1823, and especially by his forcible dissolution of the constituent assembly Nov. 12, 1823, and the banishment of the Andradas. On March 25, 1824, he accepted a constitution which had been prepared by a council of state, and which remained in force during the empire. In 1828 the Cisplatine Province, or Uruguay, became independent after three years' war with Brazil. The increasing opposition to the emperor's personality at length provoked popular tumults. Convinced that he could no longer rule, he abdicated in favor of his son, April 7, 1831, and soon after sailed for Europe. On the death of John VI. (1826) he had been proclaimed king of Portugal, but had resigned the crown in favor of his daughter, whom the usurpation of Dom Miguel had deprived of Portugal. On his arrival in Europe Dom Pedro at once headed a movement in his daughter's favor, taking a personal part in the war in Portugal. He was finally successful, and his daughter was crowned, but he died two days after. He was twice married: in 1817 to the archduchess Maria Leopoldina of Austria, who died in Dec., 1826; and in 1829 to the princess Amelia of Leuchtenberg.

Pedro II. (Dom Pedro de Alcantara), Born at Rio de Janeiro, Dec. 2, 1825: died at Paris, Dec. 5, 1891. Son of Pedro I., and second emperor of Brazil. His father resigned in his favor April 7, 1831. During his minority Brazil was governed by regents; his majority was proclaimed July 23, 1840, and he was crowned July 18, 1841. He was married in 1843 to the princess Theresa Christina, sister of the King of the Sicilies. His male children died young, and his eldest daughter, Dona Izabel de Bragança, became his constitutional successor. The principal events of his reign were: Transient rebellions in Minas Geraes and São Paulo, 1842; rebellion in Rio Grande do Sul finally suppressed, Feb., 1845; rebellion in Pernambuco suppressed, 1849; alliance with Urquiza and war in Uruguay, May, 1851, leading to the defeat of Manuel Oribe, Feb., 1852; the boundary disputes of Buenos Ayres was overthrown; invasion of Uruguay and alliance with Flores, 1864; war with Paraguay, 1865–70 (see Triple Alliance, War of the); personal abolition of slavery, Sept., 1871; slavery finally abolished as the result of a remarkable popular movement May 13, 1888. Dom Pedro visited the United States in 1876, visited the United States 1876, passing thence to Europe. Palestine, and Egypt, and returning in Sept., 1877, and visited Europe a third time 1888–89; in each case he traveled as a private gentleman, and during his absence the princess Izabel acted as regent. Her revolution which broke out Nov. 15, 1889 (the principal measures being among others) levies forced upon the emperor, and immediately sent to Europe. The ex-empress died in Portugal, Dec. 28, 1889, and thereafter Dom Pedro resided generally in France. As a ruler he was noted for the protection which he accorded to science and literature, and he was greatly respected both at home and abroad.

Pedro, surnamed "The Cruel." Born at Burgos, Spain, 1334: killed March 23, 1369. King of Castile and Leon 1350–69, son of Alfonso XI. With the aid of the Black Prince he defeated his brother Henry of Trastamara at Navarrete in 1367, but was defeated and captured by Bertrand Duguesclin, and killed. He was put to death by Henry, who succeeded to the throne.

Pedro I. Born 1320: died 1367. King of Portugal 1357–67, son of Alfonso IV. He is noted in connection with the story of Inez de Castro (see Castro, Inez de).

Pedro, Don. In Shakspere's "Much Ado about Nothing," the Prince of Aragon.

He entered the army and rose to the rank of lieutenant-general. He entered Parliament in 1836; was surveyor-general of the ordnance 1841–46; and was secretary of war 1858–59 and 1866–67.

Peel, Sir Robert. Born near Bury, Lancashire, Feb. 5, 1788: died at London, July 2, 1850. A noted English statesman. He was the son of Sir Robert Peel, a calico-printer. He graduated at Oxford (Christ Church) in 1808, and in 1809 was elected member of Parliament for Cashel. He followed with his father the Tory party. In 1811 he became undersecretary for the colonies, and was secretary for Ireland 1812–18. He opposed Catholic emancipation, and instituted the reorganized Irish constabulary (nicknamed "Peelers," a name also extended to the police generally). He was member of Parliament for the University of Oxford in 1817, but was out of office from 1818 to 1821. On May 24, 1819, he delivered a notable speech on the Cash Payments Act. In 1822 he was appointed home secretary under Lord Liverpool, and retained the office until 1827. In 1828 he was appointed home secretary under the Duke of Wellington, and made leader of the House of Commons. In 1829 he changed his position and proposed Catholic emancipation. He won back his position in the Tory party by his resistance to the Reform Bill. After the passing of this bill he was left with a following of only 150, the nucleus of the modern Conservative party. In 1834 he became prime minister, first lord of the treasury, and chancellor of the exchequer; he resigned in 1835. In 1841 he was again prime minister and first lord of the treasury. He became a free-trader, and on Jan. 27, 1846, moved the repeal of the corn-laws, which was carried.

Peele (pēl), George. Born 1558?: died 1598. An English dramatist and poet. He graduated at Oxford in 1577. He is said to have lived a disreputable life. He published the "Chronicle of the Famous Battle of Pavie" (1589), the "Chronicle History of Edward I." (1593), "The Battle of Alcazar" (1594), "The Old Wives' Tale" (1595), "David and Bethsabe" (1599), etc.

Peixoto (pā-shō'tō), Floriano. Born April 30, 1826. A Brazilian soldier and politician. He supported Fonseca in the revolution of 1889; was elected vice-president under him, 1890; and by Fonseca's forced resignation, Nov. 23, 1891, became president. Many Brazilians were strongly opposed to having a military president, and it was claimed that Peixoto was scheming to be his own successor; in consequence congress passed a bill which made this succession impossible. President Peixoto vetoed the bill on constitutional grounds, but his action caused much ill feeling, and revolts broke out, principally in the south. In Sept., 1893, the naval force at Rio de Janeiro revolted, holding the bay for many months, bombarding the city at intervals, and taking Santa Catharina. (See Mello, Custodio José de.) Peixoto proclaimed a state of siege, many arrests were made, and a fleet of war vessels was ordered from the United States and Europe. On the arrival of these the naval rebellion was suppressed (March and April, 1894). Meanwhile a presidential election was held, and a civilian, Prudente Moraes (supported by the government), was elected for the term beginning Nov. 15, 1894. President Peixoto has the military rank of marshal.

He was clerk of the acts, and, later, had in one of the chief authorities on the Restoration, in which Pepys actively participated. Montagu made him secretary to the generals at sea, clerk of the check, and clerk of the acts of the navy June 28, 1660. Pepys, the great plague he remained in London and labored on to the utmost administration of the navy as secretary of the admiralty. He also assisted in founding Greenwich Hospital for Seamen. In 1673–74 he sat as member of Parliament for Harwich, and was twice master of Trinity House. On May 22, 1681, he was sent to the Tower as a papist, but was soon released at the request of the Royal Society. About 1690 he published "Memoirs relating to the State of the Royal Navy." His library of 3,000 volumes was bequeathed to Magdalene College, Cambridge. The last entry in the "Diary" was made May 29, 1669. It was written in cipher, and was translated by the Rev. J. Smith and published, with many omissions, by Lord Braybrooke (who had discovered it in the Pepysian Library) in 1825. In 1875 (1879 ?) the Rev. Mynors Bright republished it with much additional matter, and in 1893 a new edition containing all the omitted portions, with the notes of both earlier editions, was edited by H. B. Wheatley.

Pepysian (pē'pis-i-an) Library. The library of Samuel Pepys (containing the cipher MS. of his "Diary"), bequeathed by him to Magdalene College, Cambridge. It is in a separate building, which was approaching completion about the time Pepys determined to bequeath his collection either to Magdalene or to Trinity, and in which (in the former case) he wished it to be deposited. The library came into the possession of the college on the death of his nephew, Mr. Jackson, in 1724.

Pequot (pē'kwot). [M., also Pequots. The name is translated 'destroyers' or 'ravagers.'] A former tribe of North American Indians, the most dreaded of all in southern New England. History. They formed one tribe with the Mohegans who seceded under Uncas from sassacus, the great Pequot chief. Their first known territory was on eastern strip of coast in Connecticut from Niantic River to the Rhode Island boundary, but sassacus early defeated the tribes of Connecticut east of the river of that name and westward to near New Haven, and nearly all Long Island. The reported strength was about 4000, but has been estimated as much greater. In 1637 the English colonists subjugated their principal fort, on the Mystic River, and slaughtered six hundred. The survivors of them broke up and scattered bands, some reaching tribes with whom they became amalgamated. Also Pequod, Pequoit, Pequoquot.

The site belonged to a rich burgher in the 16th century, and was called "La Folie-Regnault." It was bought by the Jesuits in 1626, and named Mont-Louis. It was later enlarged by Père Lachaise, the Jesuit confessor of Louis XIV., and has always borne his name. It was the scene of a struggle between the Communists and the national troops May 27, 1871. See Communists, Paris of the.

Perez (pā'rāth), Antonio. Born in Aragon about 1539; died at Paris, Nov. 3, 1611. A Spanish politician, secretary of state under Philip II. At the instigation of Philip he procured the murder, for political reasons, of Escovedo, secretary of don John of Austria, March 31, 1578. He lost the king's favor, and was arrested in 1579 and forced, by torture, to confess his part in the deed. He managed to escape to Aragon and to France (1591). His protection by Aragon led to the suppression by Philip of the ancient Aragonese privileges. He published "Relaciones" ("Accounts," 1594).

The letters of Perez are in a great variety of styles, from the cautious and yet fervent appeals that he made to Philip the Second, down to the gallant notes he wrote to court ladies, and the overflowings of his heart to his young children. But they are all written in remarkably intuitive Castilian, and are rendered interesting from the circumstance, that in each class there is a strict observance of such conventional forms as were required by the relative social positions of the author and his correspondents.

Ticknor, Span. Lit., III. 167.

Perez (pā'rāth), José Joaquin. Born at Santiago in 1800. A Chilean statesman. He occupied various diplomatic positions, and was under-minister and minister of the treasury 1845–49, and of the interior 1849–51. He became president of Chile Sept. 18, 1861, serving, by reelection in 1866, until Sept. 18, 1871. Under him the moderate liberals began to take part in the government. The period was one of general prosperity. War broke out with Spain in Sept., 1865, and Valparaiso was bombarded by a Spanish fleet in March, 1866. Hostilities ceased in April, though the treaty of peace was delayed many years.

Perez (pē'rez), Michael. A noted character in Beaumont and Fletcher's play "Rule a Wife and Have a Wife," known as "the Copper Captain." He is a pretentious imitation of a rich and noble soldier.

Perga (pėr'gä), or Perge (pėr'jē). [Gr. Πέργη.] In ancient geography, a city in Pamphylia, Asia Minor, situated about lat. 37° N., long. 30° 50' E. It was noted for the worship of Artemis. A Roman theater here is one of the finest surviving. The caves has 1 precinction and 40 tiers of marble seats, with a gallery at the top, colonnaded in front and arched in back. The back wall of the stage has five large niches, with fine columns of breccia. The diameter is 350 feet. The theater is in great part built up of masonry. There are other remains of a stadium, 771 feet long and 194 wide, the arena 732 by 115. The tiers of seats rest on vaulted foundations, and were skirted at the top by a gallery. There is a monumental arched entrance in the semicircular end.

Pergamum (pėr'ga-mum), or Pergamus (pėr'ga-mus). [Gr. Πέργαμον.] In ancient geography, a city in Teuthrania, Mysia, Asia Minor, situated on the Caicus 50 miles north of Smyrna: the modern Bergama or Bergama. The city was raised to importance by the famous victory of Attalus I. over the Gauls in the latter half of the 3d century B. C. To the son of Attalus, Eumenes II., are due the great extension of the city and its architectural embellishment; and during his reign occurred the remarkable development of Pergamene sculpture, on lines of much more modern spirit than the older Greek art. The same king founded the famous Pergamene Library. His chief buildings were placed on a succession of terraces on the summit of the acropolis, which rises 900 feet above the plain, and on other lower terraces immediately outside of the powerful acropolis walls. The city remained prosperous under the Romans (see Pergamum, Kingdom of), and many fine buildings were erected on the acropolis, and beside the Selinus River below, under the empire. In 1878 the Prussian government sent to the site an exploring expedition under Conge, Humann, and Bohn. Their investigations were continued for several years, and to them are due the rediscovery of Pergamene art and the mass of new information regarding later Greek architecture which together form one of the most remarkable archæological acquisitions of the century. The sculptures discovered at Pergamum are preserved at Berlin. The great altar of Zeus consisted of an immense quadrangular basement with a broad flight of steps penetrating one side. The top was surrounded by an Ionic peristyle which inclosed the altar proper on 3 sides. On the wall of this peristyle was the smaller frieze of the famous Pergamum Marbles, while around the basement and along the stairs was carried the large frieze. The latter was excavated in 1879–80, and now is the chief treasure of the Old Museum at Berlin. This extensive frieze dates from about 180 B. C., and belongs to the monumental commemoration of the triumph of Eumenes II. over the invading Gauls. It represents in high relief the victorious battle of the gods against the giants, the two chief groups centering about Zeus and Athene. The figures are of colossal size, and the sculpture is of remarkable vigor: it represents an entirely new phase of Greek art, more emotional and modern in feeling than had been developed elsewhere. The altar of Pergamum, excavated at the same time, is now also in the Old Museum at Berlin. This frieze adorned the monumental structures which stood upon the colossal altar. Its subject is the story of the love of Telephus, and it is extremely pleasing in conception and execution. There are a Greek theater and a Roman amphitheater, and remains of several temples. An Ionic temple, of the finest Greek design, is on the slope of the acropolis: the cella with its ornamented doorway remains unusually perfect. The temple of Athene Polias, a Doric peripteral of 6 by 10 columns, of late Greek date, measuring 42½ by 72 feet, occupied a terrace which was surrounded on two or three sides by a handsome stoa of two stories, Doric below and Ionic above, with a substructure sculptured with warlike trophies in the second story. The temple of Trajan, occupying a large terrace toward the summit of the acropolis, was a Corinthian peripteros of white marble.

Pergamum, Kingdom of. An ancient Greek kingdom in Asia Minor. Its rise to prominence under Attalus I. in the 3d century B. C. Attalus III. died 133 B. C., and bequeathed the kingdom to Rome. It was made a province under the name of Asia.

Pergamus, or Pergamum. The name given in the Iliad to the citadel of Troy.

Perge. See Perga.

Pergola (per'gō-lä). A town in the province of Pesaro e Urbino, Italy, situated on the Cesano 15 miles southeast of Urbino. Population (1881), commune, 9,120.

Pergolesi (per-gō-lä'sē), or Pergolese (per-gō-lä'se), Giovanni Battista. Born at Jesi, Jan. 3, 1710; died at Pozzuoli, March 16, 1736. A noted Italian composer. He produced several operas, and at first studied the violin under Domenico de Matteis, then counterpoint and vocal composition. He composed his first opera, "La Sallustia," about 1731, and two others in rapid succession. These were not successful, and he ceased writing for the stage and composed 2 masses and 30 trios for violins and bass viol. Shortly after (apparently within the same year) he produced his very successful operetta "La Serva Padrona": this was the basis of Italian comic opera to the time of Rossini (Grove). He died while finishing his "Stabat Mater" for two voices, soprano and contralto, among his other works are "Flaminio" (1735: an opera buffe), "Salve Regina," "Dies Iræ," "Orfeo e Euridice" (a cantata), and much church and chamber music.

Periander (per-i-an'dėr). [Gr. Περίανδρος.] Died 585 B. C. Tyrant of Corinth 625–585 B. C. He is usually counted among the seven wise men of Greece.

The cruel tyranny of Periander is agreed on by all writers. There is some difference of detail. He set up a body-guard of 300 men, made several popular laws, kept the citizens poor by means of fines and confiscations, shed abundant blood, and was frequently guilty of the grossest outrages. Rawlinson, Herod., III. 293, note.

Pericles (per'i-klēz). [Gr. Περικλῆς.] Born probably about 495 B. C.: died at Athens, 429 B. C. A celebrated Athenian statesman and orator, son of Xanthippus. He entered public life about 469, became the leader of the democratic party, procured the ostracism of Cimon and later of Thucydides. After 444 he was the principal minister of Athens. He aided in the military and naval development of the state; encouraged art and literature; completed the fortification of Athens and Piræus; caused the building of the Parthenon, Propylæa, Odeion, etc.; and commanded in the war against Samos and in the first part of the Peloponnesian war. See Aspasia.

Pericles, Prince of Tyre. A play by Shakspere, probably on the stage in 1608, published in 1609. It is thought that George Wilkins wrote part of it.

Pericu (pā-rē-kō'). [Pl., also Pericus.] A tribe or division of North American Indians, living at the southern end of Lower California (to about lat. 24° N.). See Yuman.

Periegesis (per'i-ē-jē'sis). [Gr. Περιήγησις.] A description of the world in about 1,000 iambic lines, by Seymnus of Chios (about 74 B. C.). This poem is extant.

Périer (pā-ryā'). Casimir. Born at Grenoble, France, Oct. 21, 1777: died May 15–16, 1832. A French statesman and financier. He was a member of the Chamber of Deputies under Louis XVIII. and Charles X. (acting with the opposition), and was premier 1831–32.

Périer, Jean Paul Pierre Casimir (called Casimir-Périer). Born at Paris, Nov. 8, 1847. A French statesman, elected president of the French republic June 27, 1894. He is a grandson of Casimir Périer (1777–1832).

Périgord (pā-rē-gōr'). An ancient county-ship of France, which formed part of the government of Guienne. Capital, Périgueux. It was bounded by Angoumois on the north, Quercy and Limousin on the east, Agenais on the south, and Saintonge on the west. It was largely included in the department of Dordogne. It appears as a county-ship, a fief of Aquitaine, in the 10th century; followed mainly the fortunes of Aquitaine; and was united to France under Henry IV.

Perigot (per'i-got). The principal character in Fletcher's "Faithful Shepherdess."

Périgueux (pā-rē-gē'). The capital of the department of Dordogne, France, situated on the river Isle 54 in. (at 45° 11' N., long. 0° 44' E.: the ancient Vesuna or Vesunna. It has considerable commerce, and is noted for its "Périgord pies" of truffles and partridges. The cathedral, one of the most remarkable of medieval monuments, dates from the 11th century. Its plan and dimensions it almost exactly reproduces St. Mark's at Venice: the present view is that both were inspired by the Church of the Holy Apostles at Constantinople. The plan is a Greek cross, measuring about 183 feet each way, covered by 5 domes on pendentives, about 30 feet in diameter and 100 high. The construction is of main masonry, with some Romanesque arcades, and entirely without the wonderful Byzantine decoration in sculpture and color. The exterior, however, as restored, is highly impressive. The chevet is a remodeled 14th-century chapel, and at the west end there is a narthex formed of part of an earlier church, with a very old and curious tower, 197 feet high. This is the parent of all French medieval domical churches. Other objects of interest are the museum, the old cathedral of St. Etienne, a ruined ancient amphitheater, and the Roman Tour de Vesone. Vesone was the chief place of the Petrocorii, and later a flourishing Roman town. The place was taken by the English in 1356, and was occupied by the Huguenots from 1575 to 1581. Population (1891), commune, 31,439.

Perim (pā-rēm'). A small island in the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb, at the entrance of the Red Sea. It belongs to Great Britain, and is used as a coaling-station.

Perimedes (per-i-mē'dēz) the Blacksmith. A collection of love-stories interspersed with poems, by Robert Greene, published in 1588. The stories are mostly from Boccaccio.

Perinthus, or Heraclea Perinthus (her-g-klē'ä pe-rin'thus), [Gr. Ἡράκλεια Περίνθος.] In ancient geography, a city of Thrace, situated on the Propontis. It was given to walking about, esp. while teaching or disputing. The name was given to Aristotle and his followers because he taught in the walks of the Lyceum at Athens.] The followers of Aristotle (384–322 B. C.). In the middle ages the word was often used to signify 'logicians.' See Aristotle.

Periplus (per'i-plus). [L., from Gr. περίπλους, περίπλοον, a sailing around, an encircling, a coasting voyage.] The title of various geographical works of antiquity. The oldest extant is by Scylax of Caryanda in Caria, assigned by Niebuhr to the time of Alexander the Great. There were also similar works by Nearchus, Arathachides, Bome, Timagenes, and others.

Periscii (pe-rish'i-i). The inhabitants of the polar circles: so called because in their summer-time their shadows describe an oval.

Perissa (pe-ris'ä). In Spenser's "Faerie Queene," the youngest of three sisters who were always discordant. See Medina.

Perizzites (per'i-zīts). In Old Testament history, a people of Canaan, living west of the Jordan in the region between Bethel and Shechem.

The Perizzites, however, did not represent either a race or a tribe. They were the people of the "cultivated plain," the agriculturists of that part of the country which was capable of tillage, like the western fellahin of Egypt. They belonged accordingly to various races and nationalities: there were Israelitish Perizzim as well as Canaanitish or Amorite Perizzim. The name was a descriptive one, like that of Kadmonite or "Eastern" which denoted the population on the eastern side of the Jordan.

Sayce, Races of the O. T., p. 120.

Perjur'd Husband, The, or the Adventures of Venice. A tragedy by Mrs. Centlivre, produced and printed in 1700. This was her first play.

Perkins (per'kinz). Charles Callahan. Born at Boston, March 1, 1823: died at Windsor, Vt., Aug. 25, 1886. An American writer on art. He studied painting both in Rome and Paris, and afterward music and etching. He published "Tuscan Sculptors, etc." (1864), "Italian Sculptors, etc." (1868), "Raphael and Michelangelo" (1878), "Historical Hand-book of Italian sculptors," "History of the Handel and Haydn Society (of which he was president) (1883–), Cruikshank's work (1882, at Paris), etc. He edited "Art in the Home" etc. (1879), and was critical editor of a "Cyclopedia of Painters and Paintings" (1886).

Perkins, Justin. Born at West Springfield, Mass., March 12, 1805: died at Chicopee, Mass., Dec. 31, 1869. An American Congregational missionary among the Nestorians in Persia.

Perkin Warbeck. See Warbeck.

Perla (per'lä), La. [It., 'the pearl.'] A painting of the Holy Family, by Raphael, in the Royal Museum at Madrid. It was so named by Philip IV., who bought it from the needle-brand Charles I. of Great Britain, and exclaimed when he saw it: "This is the pearl of my pictures!" The coloring is opaque, and the shadows heavy: the kind is considered overrated.

Perleberg (per'le-berg). A town in the province of Brandenburg, Prussia, situated on the Stepenitz 76 miles northwest of Berlin. Population (1890), 7,565.

Perle du Brésil, La. [F., 'The Pearl of Brazil.'] An opera by Félicien David, produced at Paris in 1851.

Perm (perm). 1. A government in eastern Russia, situated on both sides of the Ural Mountains, and bordering on Siberia. It is watered by the Kama, Obi, and Pechora systems. It is the chief mining government in Russia, producing gold, silver, iron, copper, platinum, and other minerals and precious stones. Area, 128,211 square miles. Population (1890), 2,311,300.

2. The capital of the government of Perm, situated on the Kama about lat. 58° N., long. 56° 30' E. It is on the main route to Siberia, and is the seat of an important transit trade. Population (1890), 44,700.

Permians (per'mi-anz), or Permyaks (perm'yäks). A people living in the government of Perm, Russia, belonging to the Finnic stock. They number about 60,000.

Pernambuco (per-näm-bō'kō; Pg. pron. per-nänbō'kō). A maritime state of Brazil, situated about lat. 7°–10° S. Area, 49,625 square miles. Population, estimated (1888), 1,110,851.

Pernambuco, or Recife (re-sē'fe). A seaport, capital of the state of Pernambuco, situated on the coast in lat. 8° 3' S., long. 34° 52' W. It is composed of three parts separated by narrow channels—Recife, Santo Antonio, and Boa Vista. It is one of the chief commercial cities of Brazil. The leading export is sugar. Population variously estimated at 70,000 to 100,000.

Pernau (per'nou). A seaport and watering-place in the government of Livonia, Russia, situated at the entrance of the river Pernau into the Gulf of Riga, in lat. 58° 23' N., long. 24° 29' E. It has a flourishing foreign trade. It was founded in 1255. Population, 13,529.

Perne (pėrn), Andrew. Born at East Bilney, Norfolk, 1519; died 1589. An English ecclesiastic and scholar. He was a graduate and fellow of Queens' College, and master of Peterhouse, Cambridge. He is best known by his changes in religious belief: he was a Catholic under Henry VIII., a Protestant under Edward VI., a Catholic again under Mary, and finally a Protestant under Elizabeth. He was, notwithstanding, a man of fine character, and rendered important service to his generation.

These changes of opinion expose him to no little ridicule. The wits of the University added a new verb to the Latin language, pernare, 'to change one's opinion.' It became proverbial to say of a cloak that had been turned, "It has been Perned." The letters A. P. A. C. on the weathercock of St. Peter's Church were explained to mean "Andrew Perne a Papist," or "Andrew Perne a Protestant," according to the fancy of the reader. Clarke, Cambridge, p. 92.

Pernelle (per-nel'), Madame. The mother of Orgon in Molière's "Tartuffe." The part was originally played by Béjart, and is usually played by a man.

Perolla and Izadora. A tragedy by Cibber, produced in 1705. It was founded on Lord Orrery's "Parthenissa."

Péronne (pā-ron'). A town and fortress in the department of Somme, France, situated on the Somme 50 miles east of Amiens. Charles III. (the Simple) was imprisoned here, and in 1468 Louis XI. was imprisoned here by Charles the Bold. It was successfully defended against the forces of the emperor Charles V. in 1536: was stormed by the English June 26, 1815; and was besieged by the Germans Dec. 27, 1870, and capitulated Jan. 10, 1871. Population (1891), commune, 4,746.

Péronne, Treaty of. A conference in 1468 between Charles the Bold, duke of Burgundy, and Louis XI. of France (who had gone to Péronne with a small escort and was imprisoned by the duke). Louis made important concessions.

Perote (pā-rō'tā). A village of the state of Vera Cruz, Mexico, about 15 miles west of Jalapa. Near it was a fort of the same name, commanding the road up the mountains. It was commenced in 1770, and was long the strongest fort in Mexico except San Juan de Ulua at Vera Cruz. It was an important point during the civil wars.

Perowne (pe-rou'), John James Stewart. Born at Bardwan, Bengal, March 13, 1824. An English divine, appointed bishop of Worcester in 1890. He graduated at Cambridge (Corpus Christi College) in 1845. He has published various theological and exegetical works.

Perperna (pèr-pèr'nä). Put to death by Pompey about 72 B.C. A Roman general in Spain, lieutenant of Sertorius whom he put to death.

Perpetua (per-pet'ū-ä), Saint. Killed at Carthage in 203. An African martyr.

> Of all the histories of martyrdom, none is so unexaggerated in its tone and language, so entirely unencumbered with miracle, none displays in such exquisite touches of nature, or, on the whole, from its minuteness and circumstantiality, touches such an air of truth and reality as that of Perpetua and Felicitas, two African females. Their death is ascribed in the Acts, to the year of the accession of Geta, the son of Severus.
> Milman, Hist. of Christianity, II. 168.

Perpetual Peace, The. A name given to the treaty concluded at Fribourg between France and the Swiss Confederation in 1516.

Perpignan (per-pēn-yoN'). The capital of the department of Pyrénées-Orientales, France, situated on the Têt in lat. 42° 44′ N., long. 2° 53′ E. It is an important fortress, and has flourishing trade and manufactures. The cathedral, founded in 1324 by Sancho II., king of Majorca, is remarkably simple in character, even its great marble retable with reliefs from the life of St. John. The nave, without aisles, is 90 feet high and 60 in span. Perpignan was the ancient residence of the kings of Majorca, passed to Aragon; was taken by Louis XI. in 1475; was unsuccessfully attacked by Francis I. in 1542; and since 1642 has belonged to France. It was the ancient capital of Roussillon. Population (1891), 33,878.

Perplexed Lovers, The. A comedy by Mrs. Centlivre, produced and printed in 1712.

Perrault (pā-rō'), Charles. Born at Paris, Jan. 12, 1628; died there, May 16, 1703. A French writer. According to his own testimony, he left the college at Beauvais in consequence of a misunderstanding with one of his professors, and spent three or four years in execrable study, especially of the classics. Two odes in eulogy of Louis XIV. brought him into favor at court, so that no opposition was raised to his admission to the French Academy, Sept. 23, 1671. His poem "Le siècle de Louis le Grand," read before this body on Jan. 27, 1687, expressed incidentally some ideas that were disparaging to the old classics. Between Boileau and Perrault arose then the great literary quarrel concerning the respective merits of the ancients and the moderns, which lasted over a dozen years, and did much to bring Perrault's name into prominence. In the course of this contention, originated by Perrault's publication of his "Parallèle des anciens et des modernes" (6 vols. wrote the two works upon which his literary fame rests: "Les hommes illustres qui ont paru en France pendant ce siècle" (1696-1700), and "Les contes de ma mère l'oye" (1697). These tales, reminiscent of our "Mother Goose," are also known simply as "Les contes de Perrault" They include such charming fairy tales as "Cinderella," "Bluebeard," "Little Red Riding-Hood," "Puss in Boots," etc. These stories were probably known long before Perrault's day, but to him belongs the credit of giving them in their French form a simple and lasting expression. The remainder of Perrault's writings have not added materially to his literary reputation, and he himself died in relative obscurity.

Perrault, Claude. Born 1613: died 1688. A French architect, brother of Charles Perrault. He devised the colonnade of the Louvre.

Perrenot, Antoine. See Granvelle.

Perrers (per'ėrz), or Perren (per'en), Alice. A mistress of Edward III., notorious for her influence in English affairs about the time of the Good Parliament (1376).

Perron (pā-rōN'), Madame de. The special agent of Catharine de' Medici in superintending the works by Philibert de l'Orme at the Tuileries. Catharine herself is said to have made drawings for the work.

Perry (per'i), Arthur Latham. Born at Lyme, N. H., Feb. 27, 1830. An American political economist, professor at Williams College. He published "Political Economy" (1865), etc.

Perry, Matthew Calbraith. Born at Newport, R. I., April 10, 1794: died at New York, March 4, 1858. An American naval officer. He served in the War of 1812 and the Mexican war, and commanded the expedition to Japan 1853-54, during which he concluded the treaty opening Japan to American commerce. He has one son noted in 1891.

Perry, Oliver Hazard. Born at South Kingstown, R. I., Aug. 23, 1785: died at Port Spain, Trinidad, Aug. 23, 1819. An American naval officer, brother of M. C. Perry. He became a midshipman in 1799, served in the Tripolitan war, and defeated the British in the celebrated battle of Lake Erie (which see) Sept. 10, 1813. He announced his victory in a note to General Harrison in the words "We have met the enemy, and they are ours." His victory enabled General Harrison to invade Canada supported by Perry's squadron. Perry commanded the naval battalion in the battle of the Thames Oct. 5, 1813. These two victories restored Michigan to the United States and established the supremacy of the Americans on the northwestern frontier during the rest of the War of 1812. Perry received from Congress a vote of thanks, a medal, and the rank of captain. He subsequently assisted in the defense of Baltimore.

Perry, William Stevens. Born at Providence, R. I., Jan. 22, 1832. An American bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and historical writer. Persephone. See Proserpina.

Persepolis (pėr-sep'ō-lis). In ancient geography, one of the capitals of the Persian empire, situated not far from the Kur, about 35 miles northeast of the modern Shiraz, about lat. 30° N. It became the capital under Darius I.: was captured and burned by Alexander the Great about 330 B. C.; and in mediæval times was the seat of Islamic civilization. Ruins of Istakhr, the later Sassanian city. The most remarkable monuments are grouped on a terrace of smooth rock and masonry, artificially constructed, though with irregular projections, measuring 940 by 1,550 feet, and attaining in front the height of 43 feet, of fine polygonal masonry, and in the rear of 82 feet, of the living rock and foot-hills behind. The chief buildings on the terrace were the Propylæa and the great hypostyle hall of Xerxes, the Hall of 100 Columns, attributed to Darius, and the residence palace of Darius and his successors. The Propylæa in their present form consist of two end-passages between piers of masonry from the front pair of which a wall formerly extended on each side, while into the intervals between the passages stood two pairs of great columns all of whose superstructure is now gone. To one side of the Propylæa, toward the south, rises a terrace-platform 60 feet high, upon which stand the ruins of the hypostyle hall or throne-pavilion of Xerxes. This consisted of a central square of 12 columns and 12 pilasters, and a surrounding portico of 36 columns set at an interval by 3 hexastyle porticos, each of 12 columns of the same sizes as those of the main group. The indications are that this structure never possessed inclosing walls, but was open hall of audience for Persian palaces, and fitted upon occasions of ceremony with hangings. The massive entablatures and the coffered ceilings were of wood, the roof of burnt tile. Of the Hall of Columns, the flat platform still stand almost entire; their height is nearly 64 feet, their intercolumniation 29. This monument was one of the greatest ever built by man. The Tomb of Xerxes, in the middle of the terrace, was the throne-pavilion of Darius, the Hall of 100 Columns, a building 250 feet square, preceded on the north by an octastyle portico in antis of four columns. Within the palace of Xerxes, that of Darius was surrounded by a massive wall, and the roof was supported by 10 ranges each of 10 columns with an intercolumniation of over 29 feet. The door and window-frames, antæ, and niches of stone, and the bases of most of the columns, remain in place, while the brick walls have disappeared utterly. The residence palaces overlapped the southern part of the terrace, and appear to have been 5 in number. The most important are those of Darius and Xerxes, most of the piers, massive door- and window-frames, and other members of stone are still erect, while the brick walls and the wooden superstructure have perished. These palaces are similar in plan: there was a large covered hall in the middle, and the rooms and suites of which opened a number of rather small rooms, while the more spacious royal apartments were at the back. The cornices over the great doors have precisely the Egyptian elements and profile, but differ in their decoration. In the palace of Darius carved reliefs of men fighting animals occur, based on Assyrian originals; in that of Xerxes the sculptures represent subjects pertaining to royal luxury. Great figures of bulls, often set up before the portals, recall the Assyrian practice. The columns, somewhat slender in type, have sculptured bases of inverted bell-form, and capitals with the fore parts of bulls projecting widely on 2 sides, like those of the Portico of the Bulls at Delos, and often beneath an erect circlet of plume-like leaves above a convex band of pendent lanceolate leaves, the entire profile being strikingly similar to that of the newly classified Greek Æolic capital, in which spreading volutes replace the bulls. In the face of the cliff behind the terrace are the decorated façades of royal rock-tombs. The chief explorations are due to Flandin and Coste in 1840-41, and to Stolze and Andreas prior to 1882. In 1891 some excavations were made by Herbert Weld Blundell, and casts of the sculptures and inscriptions taken by a private expedition sent out from England.

Perseus (pėr'sūs). [Gr. Περσεύς.] 1. In Greek mythology, a hero, son of Zeus or Danaë, who slew the Gorgon Medusa, and afterward saved Andromeda from a sea-monster. See Danaë.—2. An ancient northern constellation, the figure of which represents Perseus in a singular posture, holding the head of the Gorgon in one hand and waving a sword with the other.

Perseus, A celebrated statue by Canova (1800), in the Vatican, Rome. As an art-work it is of high technical perfection, but is little more than a travesty of the antique.

Perseus, Died in the middle of the 2d century B. C. The last king of Macedonia, son of Philip V., whom he succeeded 179. He began war with Rome in 172; was defeated at Pydna by Æmilius Paulus in 168; and was dethroned and taken captive to Rome in 167 B. C.

Perseus and Andromeda. 1. A painting by Rubens, in the Hermitage Museum, St. Petersburg. Perseus has already conquered the monster, and approaches Andromeda, who is chained nude to a rock, and is being set free by Cupids. Victory approaches to crown Perseus, and Pegasus is seen in the background. 2. A painting by Tintoretto, in the Hermitage Museum, St. Petersburg. The figure of the chained Andromeda is much admired for its beauty of form and color. Perseus is in the act of overcoming the dragon. The palace of Cepheus appears in the distance.

Perseus and Medusa. A statue by Benvenuto Cellini, in the Loggia dei Lanzi, Florence. The helmeted hero, holding his falchion, stands over the bleeding body of Medusa and uplifts her severed head. The elaborate pedestal, with its mythological figures, is rather goldsmith's than sculptor's work, and the statue, despite its celebrity, illustrates the limitations of Cellini.

Pershore (pėr'shōr). A town in Worcestershire, England, situated on the Avon 9 miles southeast of Worcester. Population (1891), about 4,000.

Persia (pėr'shä or pėr'zhä), F. Perse (pärs), G. Persien (per'sē-en), Persian name Iran (é-rän'). A country of western Asia. Capital, Teheran. It is bounded by Transcaucasia (Russia), the Caspian Sea, and Russian Central Asia on the north, Afghanistan and Baluchistan on the east, the Arabian Sea, Strait of Ormuz, and Persian Gulf on the south, and the Persian Gulf and Turkey on the west. The surface is largely mountainous and table-land. The principal mountains are the Elburz range, northwest, north (the Elburz), and east. Much of the country is desert, and without drainage to the sea. Wheat, sugar, fruits, etc., are produced; and the leading manufactures are silks, cotton shawls, arms, carpets, etc. The chief divisions are Azerbaijan, Gilan, Mazanderan, Khorasan, Kirman, Mekran, Laristan, Farsistan, Yezd, Khuristan, Arabistan, Irak Ajami, and Azistan. The government is an absolute monarchy under a hereditary shah. The prevailing religion is Shiite Mohammedanism. The Persians are a leading race: there are also Turks, Arabs, Armenians, Kurds, etc. According to Sayce, Howorth, and other modern scholars, the ancient Persians came to Elam about 600 B. C., and, from Elam, from Parsua (which was probably near Lake Urumiah). The Persians overthrew Astyages about 549 B. C., and the combined Medo-Persian monarchy rose to power under Cyrus the Great in the same century. Under the Pahlavi dynasty the monarchy. It engaged in war against the Greeks under Darius and Xerxes. The first empire under the Achæmenians was overthrown by Alexander the Great at the battles of Issus (333) and Arbela (331); and the country was ruled by Alexander the Great and his successors, and by the Seleucidæ, until the rise of the Parthian monarchy in the middle of the 3d century B. C. The Parthian empire of the Arsacidæ was overthrown by the second Persian empire of the Sassanians 226–228 A. D. Persia was often at war with Rome. It was at its height in the reigns of Khusrau I. and II. in the 6th and 7th centuries; was overthrown by the Saracens at the battles of Kadisiyah (about 630) and Nehavend (about 641); came under the caliphate, Seljuks, Kharesmians, and Mongols; was conquered by Timur in the end of the 14th century; was under the Sufi dynasty 1499–1722; was dismembered by Nadir Shah's conquests; and was under Nadir Shah 1736–47. Persians, The. One of the extant dramas of Æschylus.

Persian Wars. In ancient Greek history, the wars between Persia and the Greeks, commencing in 500 and ending about 449 B. C. The wars began with a revolt of the Ionian Greeks against Persia in 500. The Ionians were subjugated in 494. The assistance rendered them by Athens and Eretria provoked the Persians to attempt the conquest of European Greece. With this object in view, four grand expeditions were undertaken, each of which was repelled. The first expedition was undertaken in 495 under Mardonius, who returned after having lost part of his army in an attack by the Thracians, and after having suffered the loss of his fleet in a storm. The second expedition was undertaken in 490 under Artaphernes (the young nephew of Darius), assisted by the experienced general Datis. It was abandoned after the defeat of the army at the battle of Marathon, Sept. 12, 490. The third expedition was undertaken in 480 under Xerxes. It consisted of an army of 800,000 men, exclusive of European allies, and a fleet of 1,200 war-ships, besides 3,000 transport vessels. The army forced the pass of Thermopylæ after a brave defense by the Greeks under Leonidas, and destroyed Athens in 480. In the same year the fleet fought the indecisive battle at Artemisium and was defeated at Salamis, which compelled the retreat of Xerxes. The fourth expedition was undertaken in 479 under Mardonius. Mardonius fell at the battle of Platæa, and his army was routed. In the same day, according to tradition, the Persian fleet under Mardontes was defeated at the battle of Mycale. Hitherto the Greeks had acted on the defensive; they now assumed the offensive, gaining the victories of the Eurymedon in 466 or 465 and of Salamis in Cyprus in 449. After the battle of Salamis negotiations for peace were opened, and, although no formal treaty was adopted, peace was gradually restored on the basis of existing relations. By some the name Persian wars is restricted to the period between 500 and 479 inclusive, during which the Greeks acted on the defensive.

Persius (pėr'shi-us) (Aulus Persius Flaccus). Born at Volaterræ, Etruria, 34 A. D.: died 62 A. D. A Roman satirist. His six satires have been edited by Jahn, Conington, Gildersleeve, and others.

Under Nero the youthful and immature but independent poet, A. Persius Flaccus (A. D. 34–62) of Volaterræ, wrote six satires which are versified lectures on Stoic tenets. The want of independence of the beginner is manifested in the extensive employment of Horatian phrases and characters. The exaggeration and bombast characteristic of the manner of the period are in these satires carried to obscurity. But the staunch earnestness of the young moralist won for him lively admiration immediately after his death.

Peru (pe-rö'), Per (pā-rö'), or F. Pérou (pā-rö'). [See Birú.] A republic of South America. Capital, Lima. It is bounded by Ecuador on the north, Brazil and Bolivia on the east, Chile on the south, and the Pacific Ocean on the southwest and west. The western and southern parts are traversed from north to south by three principal chains or cordilleras of the Andes; they inclose several high plateaus. In the northeastern part are extensive wooded plains, which, with the eastern slopes and valleys of the Andes, are drained by the Amazon and its tributaries. It is extremely rich in mineral wealth (gold, silver, etc.), agricultural products (sugar, cotton, etc.), lumber, cinchona, coca, india-rubber, wool, etc. It has 18 departments. The executive power in the republic is vested in a president, the legislative in a congress composed of a senate and a house of representatives. The inhabitants are chiefly Peruvians (of Spanish descent) and Indians. The prevailing language is Spanish; the prevalent religion that of the Catholic. Civilization was developed under the empire of the Incas (see Incas and Inca Empire) and their predecessors, the Peruvians (which see). The country was conquered by the Spaniards under Pizarro in 1535–38. Independence was proclaimed in 1821, and the Spanish viceroy was finally defeated at the battle of Ayacucho Dec. 9, 1824. Peru has suffered from frequent revolutions. It was at war with Spain in 1865–66; and has several times been ravaged by earthquakes. A war with Chile began in 1879; Lima was entered by the Chilenos in 1881, and by a treaty signed Oct. 20, 1883, the provinces of Tacna and Arica to be occupied by Chile until 1893. Peru, Upper or Alto. A common name, during the colonial period, for Charcas, or the modern Bolivia. See Charcas.

Peru, Viceroyalty of. The region governed by the viceroys of Peru, who resided at Lima. The conquest of Peru proper led to that of Chile, Charcas (Bolivia), and Quito (Ecuador); and Pizarro, with his successors the viceroys, controlled those countries through their audiences and presidencies or governments. New Granada, Panama, and Paraguay (including all the Platine region) were later added to Peru; so that in the 17th century and part of the 18th viceroyalty of Peru virtually embraced all of Spanish South America and the Isthmus; that is, the audiencias districts of Lima, Charcas, Buenos Ayres, Santiago de Chile, Quito, Bogotá, and Panama. The viceroy was appointed by the crown, and corresponded directly with the Council of the Indies. He received a salary of 30,000 ducats, or 10,000 more than the viceroy of Mexico; had military as well as civil jurisdiction; and was president of the audience of Lima. Gradually his authority in the outlying provinces was restricted. In 1778 New Granada was completely separated; Quito, which was at first attached to it, was restored to Peru in 1739. The formation of the viceroyalty of La Plata (1776) reduced Peru to Peru proper, Chile, and Quito, the viceroy at Lima controlling the last-town military and treasury matters only. His arrangement continued until the revolution.

A Swiss educator and writer, celebrated for his reforms in the methods of education. He studied theology and then jurisprudence at Zurich. Subsequently he turned his attention to agriculture. He had already determined to devote himself to the education of the people, and had established in 1775, on his estate near Birr, a poor-school which was intended to draw its support from popular subscription. He was obliged, however, to give this up in 1780. The fact-memory of his method of instruction was published at this time in Iselin's "Ephemeriden" with the title "Abendstunden eines Einsiedlers" ("Evening Hours of a Hermit"). His principal literary work is the didactic novel "Lienhard und Gertrud; ein Buch für das Volk" ("Lienhard and Gertrude: a Book for the People"), which was written between 1781 and 1785. In 1798, with government support, he founded an educational institution for poor children at Stanz, which was, however, given up the year after. He now took charge of a school at Burgdorf, which was removed in 1801 to Munchenbuchsee, and the following year to Yverdon, where it continued to exist until 1825, when, notwithstanding the renown which his pedagogical system had acquired, the enterprise was finally abandoned. His collected works were published at Brandenburg, 1869-72, in 16 volumes. Peterborough (pē'tėr-bur-ō). A city in the counties of Northampton and Huntingdon, England, situated on the Nen 75 miles north of London. It is a railway and trading center. A Benedictine abbey was founded here in 655. The cathedral, one of the most important of English Norman churches, was begun early in the 12th century and finished before the 13th, except the interpolated Decorated windows, the Perpendicular retrochoir, the 13th-century northwest tower, the fine central tower of the 14th, and the famous west front of the 13th. The west front consists of 3 grand gabled arches of equal height, the central one much the narrowest, between two small arcaded and pinnacled towers. The pendarches are filled with rosettes and statues in niches, and above the arches is carried a range of arcades with statues. Each gable contains a small wheel. This splendid front forms in fact an open screen before the actual front of the cathedral: it is marred by a low Perpendicular porch inserted in the opening of the central arch. The interior is light and effective. The ceiling of the nave, though of the 12th century, is of wood; that of the choir is Perpendicular. The chevet of the church was originally of apsidal form, and this can still be traced in the later retro-choir. The dimensions are 471 by 81 feet; length of east transepts, 202; height of vaulting, 81. Population (1891), 25,172.

Final operations began March 25, 1865; and after the battle of Five Forks (March 31 and April 1) it was evacuated by the Confederates April 2–3, and surrendered April 3. Population (1890), 22,690.

Peter Schlemihl (pā'ter shlā'mēl). "The Story of a Man Without a Shadow," a romance by Chamisso, published in 1814.

Chamisso's "Peter Schlemihl" . . . is a faultless work of art, and one of deep import. There, too, a popular superstition forms the leading motive, namely, the idea that a man might lose his shadow, the devil carrying it off when he could not get the man himself into his power. This tale deserves its universal renown. The poet has made the heavy, unsociable and entirely reckless . . . Peter Schlemihl means an unlucky wight, and Chamisso has attributed to this poor devil the same incapacity of coping with the world which in his own case had disposed him to solitude, to intercourse with nature, and to children of nature.

Petra (pe'trä). [Gr. Πέτρα, rock.] In ancient geography, a city in Arabia Petræa, situated in lat. 30° 19′ N., long. 35° 31′ E. The site was early occupied on account of its proximity to the commercial route between Arabia and Egypt. From the 2d century B. C. it was a stronghold of the Nabatæans. The site consists of a precipice inclosed valley on the northeastern side of Mount Hor. The sandstone rocks are brilliantly colored in many different hues, and are fantastically worn by the action of water. Petra is famous for its rock-cut architectural remains, dating from after the establishment of Roman rule in 105 A. D. These remains have been looked upon by many as those of temples and palaces, but are merely the façades, many of them considerable in scale and elaborate in ornament, of rock tombs. All lack purity in design, and most precision in execution; but some are picturesque and graceful, bringing to mind the architectural ornament of Pompeian wall-paintings: and they gain in effect by reason of their situation and by the marvelous coloring of the rock. The true buildings of Petra lie for the most part near the small stream which runs through the valley, and are very ruinous, except the heavier, massive, and almost entirely rock-cut. Petra has often been described, particularly by Laborde (1830) and G. A. Visconti (1872).

Petrarch (pē'trärk), It. Petrarca (pā-trär'kä), Francesco. Born at Arezzo, Italy, July 20, 1304: died at Arquà, near Padua, July 18 (19?), 1374. A celebrated Italian poet, one of the chief names in Italian literature. His father belonged to the party of the Bianchi, was banished at the same time as Dante; Petrarch remembered seeing the latter in his childhood. The family went to Avignon in 1313, and when about fourteen years old Petrarch went to Montpellier to begin his studies; he remained there until he was eighteen. In 1327 he first saw the Laura of his sonnets. There have been many theories as to the identity of that personage, but Petrarch's daughter, the wife of Aubbert de Naves, who married Hugues de Sade in 1325, and became the mother of eleven children. This, however, has been disputed, Petrarch's language concerning her and personal relations are not supposed to have existed between the wife of De Sade and the poet. He received a canonry at Lombez, at the foot of the Pyrenees in 1327; in 1337 he went to Rome, and visited Cardinal Giovanni Colonna, to whom he dedicated his "De Vita Solitaria," the first of his works; in Italian, the "Rime" or "Canzoniere," including sonnets and odes to, hymns to Laura, and the allegorical "Trionfi" ("Triumphs"), his last work; in Latin, the treatises "De contemptu mundi," addressed to Saint Augustine, "De vita solitaria," "De viris illustribus" (biographies), "De rem sapientia," "De quibus religiosorum," "Africa," an epic poem on Scipio Africanus, etc. His letters and orations are numerous, and he wrote in another Italian dialect besides that of Tuscany. His "Canzoniere" was edited by Marsand and by Leopardi. His life has been written by De Sade, Körting, Bartoli, etc.

Petrie (pē'trē), W. M. Flinders. Born June 3, 1853. An English Egyptologist. He was educated privately. From 1874 to 1880 he was employed surveying ancient British earthworks: 1881 and 1882 he spent in surveying the pyramids and temples of Gizeh. He returned to Egypt in 1883, as explorer to the Egypt Exploration Fund. He went twice again in the same capacity, each time making important discoveries, exploring the sites of Defenneh, Naucratis, etc., and collecting Greek, Roman, and Byzantine antiquities, all of which, with his memoirs and reports on the subject, have been published by the committee. In 1887–88 he explored the Fayum (not by the Egypt Exploration Fund), and later explored with valuable results both for the Egyptian and Palestine Exploration Funds. He has published "Stonehenge, etc." (1880), "Pyramids and Temples of Gizeh" (1883), "Historical Studies," "Historical Data of the XI Dynasty," and other monographs (1888), "Hawara, Biahmu, and Arsinoe, etc." (1888), "Surveys of the Pyramids of Dahshur, etc." (1890), "Tell el-Hesy: Digging in Egypt, 1891–1892" (1892), etc.; and contributed the article "Weights and Measures" to the 9th edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica."

Pfäfers (pfā'fers), or Pfeffers (pfef'fers). A village and watering-place in the canton of St.-Gall, Switzerland, situated on the Tamina, near Ragaz, 10 miles north of Coire. It is noted for its hot springs and romantic gorge.

Pfaff (pfäf), Christian Heinrich. Born at Stuttgart, Würtemberg, March 2, 1772: died at Kiel, Holstein, April 24, 1852. A German physicist and chemist, brother of J. F. Pfaff: professor at Kiel from 1797.

Pfaff, Johann Friedrich. Born at Stuttgart, Würtemberg, Dec. 22, 1765: died at Halle, Prussia, April 20-21, 1825. A German mathematician, professor at Halle from 1810: noted for his analytical works.

Pfaffendorf (pfäf'fen-dorf), Battle of (in 1760). See Leguitz.

Pfaffenhofen (pfäf'fen-hō-fen). A small town in Upper Bavaria, Bavaria, situated on the Ilm between Munich and Ingolstadt. On April 15, 1745, the Austrians under Batthyani defeated the French-Bavarians; and April 19, 1809, the French under Oudinot defeated the Austrians.

Pfahlgraben (pfāl'grā-ben). A long line of fortifications built by the Romans about 70 A. D. for protection against the Germans. They extended from Ratisbon northwestward to Giessen, Ems, and Homburgen. The chief fort was the Saalburg.

Pfahlgrund (pfāl'grunt).

Pfalzburg (pfälts'bōrg). A town in Lorraine, Alsace-Lorraine, situated among the Vosges 27 miles northwest of Strasburg: formerly a fortress. It was taken by the Germans in Dec., 1870. Population (1890), 4,414.

Pfeffel (pfef'fel), Gottlieb Konrad. Born at Colmar, Alsace, June 28, 1736: died there, May 1, 1809. A German poet and fabulist.

Pfeiffer (pfī'er), Franz. Born at Solothurn, Switzerland, Feb. 28, 1815: died at Vienna, May 29, 1868. A German philologist, appointed professor of the German language and literature at Vienna in 1857. He is best known for editions of medical German works, including "German Mystics of the 14th Century," etc.

Pfeiffer, Madame (Ida Reyer). Born at Vienna, Oct. 15, 1797: died there, Oct. 28, 1858. An Austrian traveler and writer of travels. She traveled in Asiatic Turkey and Egypt in 1842; in Scandinavia and Iceland in 1845; around the world 1846-48, and again 1851-54; in Madagascar 1856-58 (where she was imprisoned); and elsewhere. She published "Reise einer Wienerin in das Heilige Land" ("Journey of a Viennese to the Holy Land," 1843), "Reise nach dem skandinavischen Norden" ("Journey to the Scandinavian North," 1846), "Eine Frauenfahrt um die Welt" ("A Woman's Journey round the World," 1850), "Zweite Weltreise" ("Second Journey round the World," 1856), "Reise nach Madagascar" (1861), etc.

Pfister (pfis'ter), Albrecht. Born about 1420: died about 1470. One of the earliest German printers.

The conjecture that Pfister printed the Bible of 36 lines will not bear a critical examination. It is not enough to show that our first positive knowledge of the types and the copies of this book begins with Pfister and Bamberg. It still remains to be proved that Pfister made the types and printed the copies. The proof is wanting and the probabilities are strongly adverse.

Dawn of Typog., Invention of Printing, p. 484.

Pfizer (pit'ser), Paul Achatius. Born at Stuttgart, Würtemberg, Sept. 12, 1801: died at Tübingen, Würtemberg, July 30, 1867. A German publicist and liberal politician.

Pfordten (pfōr'ten), Ludwig Karl Heinrich von der. Born at Ried, Upper Austria, Sept. 11, 1811: died at Munich, Aug. 18, 1880. A Bavarian politician, premier of Bavaria 1849-59 and 1864-66.

Pforta (pfōr'tä), or Schulpforta (shōl'pfor-tä). A state school 2½ miles west of Naumburg, Prussian Saxony. It was established by the Saxon government in 1543 in a Cistercian abbey. It came under the Prussian government in 1815.

Phæthusa (fē-thō'sä). A town in the circle of Karlsruhe, Baden, situated at the junction of the Würm, Nagold, and Enz, 15 miles southeast of Karlsruhe: said to be the Roman Porta Hercyniæ. It is the leading manufacturing city of Baden: the chief industry is the manufacture of jewelry. The siege of 400 of its citizens devoting themselves to death by holding a narrow pass, to secure the escape of the margrave George Frederick after the battle of Wimpfen, May 6, 1622, is now generally discredited. Population (1890), 29,988.

Phact (fakt). [Ar.] The second-magnitude star ε Columbæ.

Phæacia (fē-ā'shi-ā). [Gr. Φαιάκια, from Φαίαξ, Φαίακες, the inhabitants.] A mythical land represented in the Odyssey as visited by Odysseus on his return from Troy to Ithaca: sometimes identified with Corcyra.

Phaed (fā'ed), or Phecda (fek'dä). [Ar. fahaddah, the thigh of the bear.] The second-magnitude star γ Ursæ Majoris.

Phædo (fē'dō), or Phædon (fē'don). [Gr. Φαίδων.] Born at Elis, Greece: lived in the first part of the 4th century B. C. A Greek philosopher, a disciple of Socrates. His name is given to a celebrated dialogue of Plato, which purports to be the last conversation of Socrates, with an account of his death.

The Phædon, or last conversation and death of Socrates, is certainly the most famous of all Plato's writings, and owes this renown not only to the infinite importance of the subject—the immortality of the soul—but to the touching scenery and pathetic situation in which the dialogue is laid. Socrates and his friends in the prison, the calm cheerfulness of the victim, the distress of the friends, the emotions even of the jailer, these pictures are only paralleled in literature by the one sacrifice which was greater and more enduring than that of the noblest and purest pagan teacher. Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., II. 180.

Phædra (fē'drä). [Gr. Φαίδρα.] In Greek legend, the daughter of Minos and Pasiphaë, sister of Ariadne, and wife of Theseus, noted for her love for her stepson Hippolytus. She was repulsed by Hippolytus, and calumniated him to Theseus, thus securing his death. When his innocence was known, she committed suicide. She was the subject of tragedies by Euripides, Seneca, and Racine, and of a lost tragedy by Sophocles.

Phædrus (fē'drus). [Gr. Φαῖδρος.] An Athenian, a friend of Plato, from whom one of Plato's most famous dialogues was named.

The Phædrus is a discourse in a far simpler setting—there are only two speakers, Socrates and Phædrus—but yet there are few Platonic works more full of poetry, as Socrates, by the shady banks of the Ilissus, and within view of the theatre of Dionysus, soars into a mighty dithyramb on the nature and origin of love, and unfolds what he holds us to long for immortality and to seek after perfection. The position of this piece in the development of the author's system has been much disputed, but there seems now to be a sort of general agreement, even among the Germans, that it was an early work. Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., II. 189.

Phædrus. Lived in the first half of the 1st century A. D. A Roman fabulist, originally a Macedonian slave. His fables, in verse, were edited by Bentley, Orelli, Müller (1877), Hervieux (1884), etc.

Phaer (fā'er), Thomas. Born at Kilgarran, Pembrokeshire, Wales: died there, 1560. An English translator. He was advocate for the Marches of Wales, and became a doctor of medicine at Oxford, where he was educated. In 1558 he published his translation of the "Seven First Books of the Eneidos of Virgil." He had begun the tenth book when he died: nine books were published in 1562. He also wrote on various subjects, including law and medicine.

Phaethon (fā'e-thon). [Gr. Φαέθων, the shining one.] In Greek mythology, a surname or the name of the sun-god Helios; also, the son of Helios and Prote. The latter obtained permission from his father to drive his chariot (the sun) across the heavens, but, being unable to check his horses, nearly set the earth on fire, and was slain by Zeus with a thunderbolt.

Phaethon, or Loose Thoughts for Loose Thinkers. A work by Charles Kingsley, published in 1852.

Phalaris (fal'a-ris). [Gr. Φάλαρις.] A tyrant of Agrigentum in Sicily from about 570 B. C. to about 554 or 549 B. C., notorious for his cruelty (notably his human sacrifices in a heated brazen bull). The spuriousness of a number of epistles which passed under his name is shown by Bentley.

Phalerum (fa-lē'rum). [Gr. Φάληρον.] In ancient geography, a seaport of Attica, Greece, south of Athens and east of Piræus.

Phanagoria (fan-a-gō'ri-ā). [Gr. Φαναγόρια.] In ancient geography, a Greek colony situated on the island now called Taman, opposite the Crimea.

Phanariots (fa-nar'i-ōts). [From Turk. Fenar, a quarter of Constantinople, so called from a lighthouse (NGr. φανάρι) on the Golden Horn.] The residents of the quarter of Fanar in Constantinople; hence, the members of a class of aristocratic Greeks, chiefly resident in the Fanar quarter of Constantinople, who held important official positions under the Turks, and furnished hospodars of Moldavia, Wallachia, etc.

Phantaste (fan-tas'tē). A light-minded trifler in Ben Jonson's "Cynthia's Revels."

Pharamond (far'a-mond). A legendary king of France, noted in the Arthurian cycle of romance. He is said to have been the first king of France, and his reign has been placed between 420-428.

Pharamond (fä-rä-mōn'), ou l'Histoire de France. A novel by La Calprenède, published in 1661.

Pharaoh (fā'rō). [L. Pharao. Gr. Φαραώ. Heb. Parōh, from Egypt. Pir-aa, Per-āa, great house. See the quotation.] A title given to the Egyptian kings. Among those mentioned by this name in the Old Testament are a contemporary of Abraham; the patron and friend of Joseph; the oppressor of the Hebrews (Rameses II.?); the Pharaoh who reigned at the time of the Exodus (Menephthah?); Pharaoh Necho (see Necho); and Pharaoh-Hophra, known as Apries or Hophra.

Pharaoh appears on the monuments as pir-aa, 'great house,' the palace in which the king lived being used to denote the king himself, just as in our own time the "porte" or gate of the palace has become synonymous with the Turkish Sultan. Sayce, Anc. Monuments, p. 59.

Pharisees (far'i-sēz). [From Heb. parash, separate.] An ancient Jewish school, sect, or party which was specially exact in its interpretation and observance of the law, both canonical and traditional. In doctrine the Pharisees held to the resurrection of the body, the existence of angels and spirits, the providence and decrees of God, the canonicity and authority of Scripture, and the authority of ecclesiastical tradition; politically they were intensely Jewish, though not constituting a distinct political party; morally they were scrupulous in the observance of the ritual and regulations of the law, both written and oral. The Pharisees antagonized John Hyrcanus I. (135–105 B. C.), and as religious reformers bitterly opposed the corruptions which had entered Judaism from the pagan religions. They were called Separatists by their opponents. In support of the authority of the law, and to provide for the many questions which it did not directly cover, they adopted the theory of an oral tradition given by God to Moses.

Pharnabazus (fär-na-bā'zus). Lived about 400 B. C. A Persian satrap in Asia Minor. He was allied with Sparta against Athens during the last part of the Peloponnesian war, and aided the Athenians under Conon against Sparta in 394 B. C.

Pharnaces (fär'na-sēz) I. King of Pontus about 190–170 B. C. He conquered Sinope in 183.

Pharnaces II. Died 47 B. C. A son of Mithridates the Great of Pontus. On the defeat of his father by the Romans in 63 B. C., he revolted and made himself master of that part of his father's dominions lying along the Cimmerian Bosporus. He afterward invaded Pontus, but was defeated by Cæsar at Zela in 47. He shortly after fell in battle.

Pharos (fā'ros). [Gr. Φάρος.] An island opposite ancient Alexandria, on which Ptolemy I. and Philadelphus II. erected the celebrated lighthouse Pharos, one of the seven wonders of the world. See Alexandria.

Pharpar (fär'pär). In Bible geography, a river of Damascus: the modern Awaj.

Pharsalia (fär-sā'li-ā). [Gr. Φαρσαλία.] A district of Thessaly, ancient Greece, containing the city of Pharsalus (which see).

Pharsalia. An epic poem in ten books, by Lucan (M. Annæus Lucanus), on the civil war between Pompey and Cæsar.

The scheme [of the Pharsalia] is prosaic, the treatment rhetorical, full of descriptions, speeches, and general reflections; the style is artificially elevated; the whole production youthful and immature, but indicative of genuine power and lofty, generous motives.
Teuffel and Schwabe, Hist. of Rom. Lit. (tr. by Warr), II. 78.

Pharsalus (fär-sā'lus). [Gr. Φάρσαλος.] In ancient geography, a city in the district of Pharsalia, Thessaly, Greece, 23 miles south of Larissa: the modern Fersala. It is celebrated for the great battle fought near it, 48 B. C., in which Cæsar with 22,000 legionaries and 1,000 cavalry totally defeated Pompey and his army of 45,000 legionaries and 7,000 cavalry.

Phaselis (fa-sē'lis). [Gr. Φασηλίς.] In ancient geography, a seaport of Lycia, Asia Minor, situated on the western shore of the Pamphylian Gulf (the modern Gulf of Adalia).

Phasis (fā'sis). [Gr. Φᾶσις.] In ancient geography, a river in Colchis. See Rion.

Phazania (fa-zā'ni-ā). In ancient geography, the modern Fezzan.

Phebe. See Phebe.

Phebo (fē'bō), Donzel del. The Knight of the Sun, a famous character in the old Spanish romances, reproduced in "The Mirror of Knighthood."

Phèdre (fādr). A tragedy by Racine, produced Jan. 1, 1677. It was founded on the story of Phædra. Within a week another play with the same name, by Pradon, was produced at the opposition theater. Owing to the tricks of the latter, Racine's play was a success, and Racine's masterpiece was nearly driven from the stage.

"Phèdre" . . . is unquestionably the most remarkable of Racine's regular tragedies. By it the style must stand or fall, and a reader need hardly go farther to appreciate it. . . . For excellence of construction, artful beauty of verse, skilful use of the limited means of appeal at the command of the dramatist, no play can surpass "Phèdre"; and if it still is found wanting, it undoubtedly is by the vast majority of critics (including nowadays a powerful minority even among Frenchmen themselves), the fault lies rather in the style than in the author, or at least in the author for adopting the style.
Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 303.

Pheidias. See Phidias.

Phelps (felps), Austin. Born at West Brookfield, Mass., Jan. 7, 1820; died at Bar Harbor, Maine, Oct. 13, 1890. An American Congregational clergyman and author, professor at Andover Theological Seminary from 1848. His works include "New Birth" (1867), "Solitude of Christ" (1868), "Theory of Preaching" (1881), "English Style in Public Discourse" (1883), "My Study" (1885), etc.

Phelps, Edward John. Born at Middlebury, Vt., 1822. An American jurist and diplomatist, son of Samuel Shethar Phelps. He became professor of law at Yale in 1881, and was United States minister to Great Britain 1885–89.

Phelps, Samuel. Born at Devonport, Feb. 13, 1804; died near Epping, Essex, Nov. 6, 1878. Anotted English actor. He went on the stage in 1838, playing in provincial towns, but was first noticed in Oct., 1836, when he appeared at Exeter with great success. He made his first appearance on the London stage (Haymarket) in 1837, and in 1844, in conjunction with Mrs. Warner and Mr. Greenwood, he took Sadler's Wells Theatre, playing there until 1862. He devoted himself to the revival of Shakspere and the older dramatists, and personated 30 of Shakspere's characters, together with such parts as Sir Pertinax Macsycophant, in which he was celebrated. He was good in tragedy, but perhaps at his best in what may be called dry and intellectual comedy.

Phelps, Samuel Shethar. Born at Litchfield, Conn., May 13, 1793; died at Middlebury, Vt., March 25, 1855. An American jurist and politician. He was United States senator from Vermont 1839–51 and 1853–54.

Phelps, William Walter. Born at New York, Aug. 24, 1839; died at Teaneck, Englewood, N. J., June 18, 1894. An American politician. He was a Republican member of Congress from New Jersey 1873–75; was United States minister to Austria 1881–82; was a member of Congress from New Jersey 1883–89; and was minister to Germany 1889–93.

Phips Ward, Elizabeth Stuart. See Ward.

Phenicia, or Phenicia (fe-nish'i). [L. Phœnice, Gr. Φοινίκη, land of palms.] The strip of land extending from 33° to 36° N. lat. on the coast of southern Syria, between Mount Lebanon and the Mediterranean Sea. It was about 200 miles in length, and its width did not exceed 35 miles at the maximum; area, about 3,000 square miles. But for Mount Lebanon (the snows of Lebanon) which irrigated it, and the energy and enterprise of its inhabitants, made this narrow tract of land one of the most varied in its products, and gave it a place in history out of proportion to its size. Its principal rivers were the Leontes (the modern Litany), north of Tyre and the Orontes (the modern Nahr el-Asy) in the north. The cedars on the mountains furnished building-material, the coast furnished sand for glass and the purple small for dyeing; and the inland plains were covered with orchards, gardens, and cornfields. Though the coast-line was deeply indented, the skill of the inhabitants secured them harbors. The ancient inhabitants of Phenicia, the Phenices of the classical writers (Poeni or Puni designating the Carthaginians, now considered by many scholars to have been Semites of the Canaanite group, though in Gen. x. 15 Sidon (Zidon), from whom the oldest city in the region was named, is described as a first-born descendant of Ham. They called themselves Canaanites, and their country Canaan. According to classical writers they emigrated from the Persian Gulf, but the reason for the assumption that the Phenicians were identical with the Punti of the Egyptian monuments. The language of the Phenicians was closely akin to Hebrew. They worshiped as principal deities Baal and Astarte, besides the seven planets under the name of Cabiri (which see). Phenicia never formed a single state under one head, but rather a confederacy of cities. In the earliest period (1500 B. C.) Sidon stood at the head of Phenician cities; about 1100 Sidon lost the hegemony to Tyre; in 761 Arvadus was added to the Phenician cities; and about the same time these three cities Tripolis (the modern Tarablus) was added. South of Tripolis lay Byblus was situated, while Berytus (the modern Beirut) in the north-east of Phenicia proper was added to the Phenician cities. To the territory of Tyre belonged Ake or Acca (the modern Acre), later called Ptolemais. Separated from the rest of Phenicia by Joppa (the modern Jaffa) lay the coast-plain of Palestine, which the Maccabees united with Palestine. The constitution of these Phenician townships was aristocratic, headed by a king. The overflowing of the Euphrates by the Mediterranean was Hiram, a contemporary and friend of David and Solomon. After Hiram six kings are supposed to have ruled until Ethbaal or Ithobal, the father of Jezebel, wife of Ahab. Under Ethbaal's grandson, Pygmalion, contentions about the throne led to the emigration of his sister Elissa (Dido in Virgil) and the foundation of Carthage. The revolt of Phenicia in the middle of the 9th century B. C. Phenicia shared the fate of Syria at large. After the battle of Karkar (854 B. C.) it became tributary to Assyria. It revolted from Assyria for independence under Shalmaneser IV., but was brought to submission by his successor, Sargon. In 609 Phenicia came for a short time into the hands of Necho II. of Egypt, but in 604 Nebuchadnezzar II. subdued it. Under Ethbaal's grandson, Pygmalion, contentions about the throne led to the emigration of his sister Elissa (Dido in Virgil) and the foundation of Carthage. The revolt of Phenicia in the middle of the 9th century B. C. Phenicia shared the fate of Syria at large. After the battle of Karkar (854 B. C.) it became tributary to Assyria. It revolted from Assyria for independence under Shalmaneser IV., but was brought to submission by his successor, Sargon. In 609 Phenicia came for a short time into the hands of Necho II. of Egypt, but in 604 Nebuchadnezzar II. subdued it for 13 years (586–573) by Nebuchadnezzar. Cyrus brought Phenicia with the rest of the Babylonian possessions under Persian supremacy. But, owing to their distinguished fleet, Phenician princes retained a part of independence. In 351 Sidon was destroyed by Artaxerxes III. The same fate befell Tyre at the hands of Alexander the Great in 332. Tyrian Phenicia was annexed by Pompey to the Syrian province of the Roman Empire. Less original and productive in the domain of thought and higher culture, the Phenicians excelled the other branches of the Semitic family in contributions to material civilization. They were the merchants and manufacturers of antiquity. They were the most skilful shipbuilders and boldest navigators. All along the Mediterranean and even beyond Gibraltar, they established colonies. They sent colonies to Cyprus, Crete, and England, and it is not improbable that they worked the tin mines of Cornwall. They even ventured to circumnavigate Africa. The principal articles of their commerce were precious stones, metals, glassware, costly textiles, and especially purple robes. Their skill in architecture was exhibited in the temple of Solomon. Their alphabetic writing became the parent of all the alphabetic systems now in use. They also transmitted a knowledge of mathematics and of weights and measures to other nations. Of the Phenician literature only a few fragments in Greek translation (by Sanchuniathon) have come down to us. Among the nameless Phenician monuments the most important is that of the sarcophagus of the "king of Sidon" Eshmunazar (best half of the 6th century B. C.), found at Sidon, and now in Paris.

Phenix, or Phœnix (fē'niks). [Gr. Φοῖνιξ.] In ancient Oriental mythology, a wonderful bird of great beauty, which, after living 500 or 600 years in the Arabian wilderness, built its own pyre of its kind, built for itself a nest of the richest spices and aromatic gums, lighted the pile with the fanning of its wings, and was burned upon it, but from its ashes revived in the freshness of youth. Hence the Phenix was a symbol of immortality. Allusions to the mythical bird in the heraldic and poetic literature of the world appear in forms in Arabic, Persian and India. In heraldry the Phenix is always represented in the midst of flames.

Pheræ (fē'rē). [Gr. Φεραί.] In ancient geography, a city in Thessaly, Greece, 25 miles southeast of Larissa. It was important in the first half of the 4th century B. C., under the tyrant Jason and his family.

Pherecydes (fe-res'i-dēz) of Syros. Born in the island of Syros; lived in the 6th century B. C. A Greek philosopher, sometimes reckoned among the seven wise men. Fragments of his work on cosmogony and theology are extant.

Pherkad (fēr'kad). [Ar. ahd-rajad, the calf.] The name of the third-magnitude star ; Ursæ Minoris. The Arabs called the two stars ε and ζ, al-farkadan the two calves, hence usually called Kokab.

Phi Beta Kappa Society. [From the Greek letters φ, β, and κ, the initials of the words which form the motto of the society.] A literary society (nominally secret), established in several American colleges, to which students of high scholarship are admitted. It was founded at William and Mary College, Virginia, in 1776.

Phidias (fid'i-as). [Gr. Φειδίας.] Born, probably at Athens, about 500 B. C.; died about 430 B. C. A celebrated Greek sculptor, the son of Charmides. He studied with Hegias of Athens, and later with Ageladas of Argos, who may have come to Athens in the time of Cimon. He became later under Pericles a counselor in political affairs of Athens, and a chief sculptor, and was a sort of supervisor of public works. Among his first works were the temple of Theseus, not definitely identified with the existing building, and a group of thirteen figures at Delphi, ordered by Cimon, son of Miltiades, to commemorate the victory at Marathon, in which Miltiades was represented among the others. To this early period are described also the Athene at Pellene, the Athene Areia at Platæa, and the Athene Promachos, or bronze colossus, on the Acropolis. This figure was probably more than 20 feet high, and conveys a true great distance. The pedestal was discovered in 1845. The statue of Olympian Zeus at Elis, his greatest work, described by Pausanias, was supposed to have been about 40 feet high, seated and holding a Nike (Victory) in his hand. The flesh was of ivory and the drapery of gold, with inlaid or inscribed decoration. On the throne itself, which rose above the head of the statue, was elaborately carved and decorated to the very top. Both throne and statue were surrounded with statues and paintings. In 444 B. C. Phidias must have been in the full enjoyment of intimate association with Pericles in his transformation of the city. All the great monuments of Athens, including the Parthenon, were erected at the time, within a period not longer than 20 years. The work of Phidias culminated in the Athene Parthenos, a chryselephantine (gold and ivory) statue of Athene in the cella of the Parthenon. It was finished and consecrated in 438. The figure was about 38 feet high, standing, and held a Nike in her right hand. The Athene Lemnia by the same master, a bronze statue, is known to us, but inadequately. The enormous expense of these works, which was paid with money exacted from the allies of Athens, brought both Pericles and Phidias into disrepute. According to Plutarch, Phidias was accused of appropriating the gold devoted to the statue to his own use. The gold was removed, weighed, and found to be intact. He was then accused of impiety in representing Pericles and himself on the shield of the goddess. On this accusation he was condemned, thrown into prison, and died there, possibly of poison, in his old age. It is doubtful. The actual style of Phidias is best represented in the well-known fragments of the frieze of the Parthenon, which easily hold the supreme place among all existing works of sculpture. Among the independent statues of Phidias was an Amazon at Ephesus which took the second prize in competition with Polycletus. This is supposed to be represented by the Amazon Mattei of the Vatican.

Phigalia (fī-gā'li-a or fig-ā'li-a). [Gr. Φιγάλεια.] In ancient geography, a town in Arcadia, Greece, situated in lat. 37° 24′ N., long. 22° 52′ E. Near it was Bassæ, which see.

Philadelphia (fil-a-del'fi-a). [Gr. Φιλαδέλφεια, city of Philadelphia.] In ancient geography, (a) A city of Lydia, Asia Minor, 78 miles east of Smyrna. It contained one of the seven churches of Asia addressed in Revelation, iii. The chief town of the Ammonites, east of the Jordan, 50 miles east of Jerusalem; earlier called Rabbah or Rabbath-Ammon.

Philadelphia (fil-a-del'fi-ā). [See City of Brotherly Love.] A city forming a county in Pennsylvania, situated on the Delaware and Schuylkill, in lat. 39° 57′ N., long. 75° 9′ W. It is the largest city in the State, and the third city in population and first manufacturing city in the country. It is called "the City of Brotherly Love." The streets are generally at right angles. The more important buildings and objects of interest are Independence Hall or Old State House, Girard's Bank, Christ Church, Girard College, the United States mint and custom-house, the post-office, the municipal buildings, and Fairmount Park. The bridges, mostly handsome structures of iron and steel, are Market, Callowhill, Arch, Chestnut, Walnut, carpets, bricks, sugar-refining, etc. The city was formerly the chief commercial city of the country; it is the terminus of steamship lines to Liverpool, Glasgow, and American ports, and the centre of the Pennsylvania, Reading, and Lehigh Valley railroads. It was formerly the place of many conventions, and previous to 1850 the first city in population. It is the seat of the American Philosophical Society, Pennsylvania Historical Society, and Academy of Natural Sciences. It was laid out in 1682 under a patent granted to William Penn; was the residence of Benjamin Franklin; was the meeting-place of the Continental Congresses in 1774 and generally afterward (the meeting-place of Independence was changed there July 4, 1776, and the Articles of Confederation in 1778); was the meeting place of the constitutional Convention in 1787; and was the capital of the country from 1790 to 1800, and the capital of Pennsylvania until 1799. It was ravaged by yellow fever in 1793. The first national bank was established here in 1791, and the second bank in 1816. There was an anti-Roman Catholic riot in 1844. The population of the city was greatly enlarged by the emancipation of Germantown, Frankford, Moyamensing, etc., in 1854. The Centennial Exposition of 1876 was held in the city. Population (1890), 1,046,964.

Philæ (fī'lē). [Gr. Φίλαι.] An island in the Nile, Upper Egypt, situated near the first cataract, in lat. 24° N. It is noted for its remains of ancient temples. The temple of Isis, built by Ptolemy Philadelphus and Arsinoe (280 B. C.), is preceded by a great double pylon, 120 feet wide and 60 high, behind which lies the Great Court, which has a colonnade on the east side, and a complete small temple, almost Greek in plan, on the west. A second pylon, of smaller size, opens on a hypostyle hall with twelve columns and 16 half-columns, colored decoration, Greek inscription shows that Isis and Osiris were worshiped here as late as 453 A. D. The Kiosk, or Pharaoh's Bed, is a small but beautiful and well-preserved temple of late date, pentagonal in plan. The capitals are of the spreading foliage type, in several forms.

Philaminte (fil-a-mant'). The wife of Chrysale in Molière's "Les femmes savantes." She is infatuated with the study of Trissotin.

Philario (fi-lā'ri-ō). In Shakspere's "Cymbeline," an Italian gentleman, friend to Posthumus.

Philaster (fi-las'tėr), or Love lies Bleeding. A play by Beaumont and Fletcher, produced about 1610, published in 1620. It was very successful. In 1663 an unsuccessful version was produced by Elkanah Settle, called "Love and Revenge, or a Right will Take Place," was published by the Duke of Buckingham. In 1764 another version was produced by Colman the elder.

Philbrick (fil'brik), John Dudley. Born at Deerfield, N. H., May 28, 1818; died at Danvers, Mass., Feb. 2, 1886. An American educator, founder of the "Quincy system" of public instruction.

Philemon (fi-lē'mon). [Gr. Φιλήμων.] In Greek legend, a Phrygian who with his wife Baucis offered hospitality to Zeus and Hermes. See Baucis.

Philemon. Born about 360 B. C.; died 262. A Greek poet of the New Attic Comedy. Fragments of his works have survived.

Philemon, Epistle of Paul to. One of the books of the New Testament, a letter written by Paul during his captivity at Rome.

Philidor. See Dunoyer.

Philinte (fe-lant'). In Molière's comedy "Le misanthrope," the friend of Alceste. He is an easy-going man who is as quietly with the faults of others only from the necessity of living among them, and who from his easy nature of the impossibility of making them better forms a happy contrast to Alceste.

Philip (fil'ip), the Apostle. [L. Philippus, from Gr. Φίλιππος, fond of horses; Ir. Filipp, Sp. Felipe, Pg. Filippe, It. Filippo.] Lived in the 1st century. One of the twelve apostles, sometimes confounded with Philip the Evangelist. Nothing is known concerning him after the ascension, though he is the subject of various legends.

Philip, surnamed "The Evangelist." Lived in the 1st century. A deacon and preacher of the early Christian church. He is noted as the agent in the professed conversion of Simon the sorcerer, and for his conversation with the Ethiopian eunuch.

Philip, surnamed "The Macedonian." Lived in the 1st century. A deacon and preacher of the early Christian church. He is noted as the agent in the professed conversion of Simon the sorcerer, and for his conversation with the Ethiopian eunuch miles south-southeast of Wheeling. The Confederates were routed here by the Federals June 3, 1861.

Philippians (fi-lip'i-anz). Epistle to the. A letter addressed by the apostle Paul to the church in Philippi. He alludes in it to the close personal relations existing between himself and the members of that church, encourages them to remain in unity, and warns them against various dangers. It was probably written at Rome shortly before his release in 63.

Philippics (fi-lip'iks). The. A group of nine orations of Demosthenes, directed against Philip of Macedon. "The real adversary in all these famous speeches is not so much the King of Macedon as the sloth and supineness of the Athenians, and the influence of the peace party, whether honest or bribed by Philip." (Mahaffy.) They are the first Philippic, urging the sending of a military force to Thrace, delivered 351 B. C.; three orations in behalf of the city of Olynthus (destroyed by Philip), delivered in 349 348; the oration "On the Peace," 346; the second Philippic, 344; the oration "On the Embassy," 344; the speech "On the Chersonese," 341; and the third Philippic, 341. The name is also given to a series of fourteen orations of Cicero against Mark Antony, delivered 44–43 B. C.

Philippicus (fi-lip'i-kus), or Philepicus (fi-lep'-i-kus) (originally Bardanes). Byzantine emperor 711–713.

Philippine (fil'ip-in) Islands, or Philippines, Sp. Islas Filipinas (ēs'lās fē-lē-pē'nās). [Named after Philip II. of Spain.] An archipelago between the China Sea on the west and the Pacific Ocean on the east. Capital, Manila. It is situated to the east of Annam and northeast of Borneo, and is separated from Celebes on the south by the Celebes Sea. The principal islands are Luzon, Camarines, Mindoro, Samar, Leyte, Panay, Negros, Cebu, Bohol, Mindanao, Palawan, and the Sulu Islands. The surface is hilly or mountainous; highest peak, 10,400 feet. The chief products are tobacco, hemp, coffee, sugar, cocoa, and rice. The group belongs to Spain, and is ruled by a governor-general and a captain-general. The inhabitants are mostly different Malay tribes (Tagals, Visayas, etc.); there are also Chinese, negritos, and mixed races. The original religion is Roman Catholic. The islands were discovered in 1521 by Magalhaes, who was killed there. Settlement was commenced in 1565. Area, 114,326 square miles. Population (excluding the Sulu Islands), 7,000,000.

Philippopolis (fil-ip-op'ō-lis), Turk. Filibe (fē'-lē-be) or Felibe. [Gr. Φιλιππούπολις, city of Philip.] The capital of Eastern Rumelia, Bulgaria, situated on the Maritza in lat. 42° 10′ N., long. 24° 45′ E. It is a trading center, and has considerable manufactures. It is the ancient city named after Philip II. of Macedon. It was occupied by the Russians in 1878. A revolution broke out there in 1885, resulting in the union of Eastern Rumelia with Bulgaria. Population (1885), 33,442.

Philippus (Roman emperor). See Philip.

Philips (fil'ips), Ambrose. Born 1671; died 1749. An English writer. He was of a Leicestershire family, and was educated at Cambridge (St. John's College), where he wrote his "Pastorals" (1709), which appeared in the sixth volume of Tonson's "Miscellanies" (the same volume in which Pope's "Pastorals" appeared). He aided Addison and Steele, and later with Pope, went to Ireland as secretary to Archbishop Boulter, and was member of Parliament for the county of Armagh, Ireland. His nickname "Namby Pamby" was conferred on him by Henry Carey, and adopted by Pope who considered it suited to his "eminence in the infantile style." Doran says, however, that he ranked with the wits at Button's Coffee House, and had no reason to fear the ridicule of men like Carey. He is best known by his play "The Distrest Mother," an adaptation of Racine's "Andromaque" (1711). Among his other plays are "The Briton" (1721), "Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester" (1722), etc.

Philips, or Phillips (fil'ips), John. Born at Bampton, Oxfordshire, 1676; died 1708. An English writer. He was educated at Winchester and at Oxford (Christ Church). "The Splendid Shilling," a burlesque of Milton's "Paradise Lost," appeared about 1703. In 1705 he published "Blenheim," also in imitation of Milton, and in 1706 "Cyder," his most ambitious work, in imitation of Vergil's "Georgics."

Philips, Mrs. (Katharine Fowler). Born at London, Jan. 1, 1631; died June 22, 1664. An English letter-writer and poet. She was known as "the matchless Orinda," because of the signature "Orinda" adopted by her in a correspondence with Sir Charles Cotterel, who used the name of "Poliarchus." She also used the name as her usual signature. She translated "Horace" and "Pompey," two of Corneille's plays, which, with a number of poems, were published in 1667.

In her seventeenth year she married a Royalist gentleman of Wales, Mr. James Philips, of Cardigan Priory. . . . She seems to have adopted the melodious pseudonym by which she has become known by peculiarly in 1651. It would appear that among her friends and associates in and near London she instituted a Society of Friendship, to which male and female members were admitted, and in which poetry, religion, and the human heart were to form the subjects of discussion. The Society, chiefly, no doubt owing to the activity of Mrs. Philips, flourished, and is well known, and was an object of interest to contemporaries. . . . The memory of the matchless Orinda was celebrated in numberless odes. All the Royalist poets combined to do her honor. Cowley numbered her in a Pindaric ode; Denham demanded the privilege of concluding her Horace. Her name was mentioned with those of Sappho and Corinna, and her fame was sung without paperwith which would have seemed a little fulsome if addressed to the Muse herself. Gosse, Hours in a Library.

Philisides (fil-is'i-dēz). In Sir Philip Sidney's "Arcadia," a shepherd whose name is formed from Sidney's own. In the same work Sidney's poems, published in 1598 is a collection of laments for Sidney, among which is a "Pastoral Eclogue upon the Death of Sir Philip Sidney, etc.," in which each shepherd begins his lament with the words "Philisides is dead." It has been attributed to Sir Edward Dyer.

Philistia (fi-lis'ti-a). In ancient geography, a country southwest of Palestine, lying along the Mediterranean. The five principal cities were Ascalon, Ashdod, Gaza, Gath, and Ekron.

Philistines (fil-is'tinz). A nation of Semitic (?) origin, dwelling in Philistia. They were frequently at war with the Hebrews, and reached their highest power in the reigns of Saul and David.

Caphtor was the original home of the Philistines, as we learn from several passages of the Bible (Deut. ii. 23, Jer. xlvii. 4, Amos ix. 7). In Genesis the reference to them has been shifted from its original place: it should follow the name of the Egyptian king and not of the Israelites. The Philistines, in fact, were the garrison established by the Egyptian kings on the southern border of Palestine to keep the cities which they had commanded the coast road from Egypt to Syria (Exod. xiii. 17), and formed the starting-point of Egyptian conquest and domination in Asia. It was needful that they should be inhabited by a population which, though akin in race to that of Canaan, were yet subjects of the Egyptian Pharaoh and bound by ties of birth to the Pharaoh's land. They came indeed from Caphtor, which was overthrown by the Assyrians, as Egypt was strong their devotion to her was unshaken; when she deserted them and retreated within the limits of her own territory, they fell under the power of Assyria and refused to mix with the population that surrounded them. Sayce, Races of the O. T., p. 53.

Phillip (fil'ip), John. Born at Aberdeen, April 19, 1817; died at London, Feb. 7, 1867. A Scottish painter. He exhibited "The Letter-Writer of Seville" at the Royal Academy in 1851. Philo, or Philo Judæus (fī'lō jū-dē'us) ('the Jew'). [Gr. Φίλων.] Born, probably at Alexandria, about 20 B. C.; died after 40 A. D. A Hellenistic Jewish philosopher of Alexandria. He went to Rome about 40 A. D., at the head of an embassy of five Jews, to plead with Caligula for the uninterrupted exercise of their religion.

The object of Philo . . . is to harmonize the philosophy of religion, which he had adopted from a study of Plato, Aristotle, and other Greek philosophers, and the belief of the Jews, which he had received not only by the practice of the Pharisees in Palestine as we infer from the example of St. Paul, but also by their conduct of the Greeks in dealing with their own sacred writings, and with Homer in particular. Besides, he had been directly preceded in this method by Aristeas and Aristobulus, and was succeeded by the Christian Fathers Clement of Alexandria and Origen. Lewes.

Philobiblon (fi-lō-bib'lon). A treatise on books by Richard Aungerville (often called Richard de Bury), bishop of Durham and chancellor of Edward III. It was finished in 1345, was printed at Cologne in 1473, and has been [illegible] in 1500, and at Oxford in 1599 (the same as the Paris edition). John Inglis published a translation in 1832. In 1856 it was collated by M. Hippolyte Cocheris, and translated into French. In 1861 an American edition was published at Albany by Samuel Gridley Howe. Another edition in New York printed the Latin text with a new translation by Andrew F. West (1889).

Philo Byblius (bib'li-us) ('of Byblus'). Lived about 100 A. D. A grammarian from Byblus in Phœnicia. See the extract.

A peculiar interest attaches itself to a writer of this period, who was a younger contemporary of Plutarch, and whose works, if extant in a complete form, would have furnished important contributions to the history and mythology of the ancient Phœnicians. Philo, a native of Byblos, at the foot of Mount Lebanon, obtained a considerable reputation as a grammarian at the end of the first and at the beginning of the second century of our era. He was born, it seems, in the reign of Nero and lived long enough to write a history of Hadrian. It is probable that he was established at Rome as a client of Herennius Severus, who obtained the consulship probably as consul suffectus, about the year 125 A. D. He published, at the request of Herennius, and is supposed by some to have translated into Greek, a work on Phœnician history, which he professed to have found in the temple of Astarte at Byblos, and which he ascribed to Sanchuniathon, a writer who is said to have lived before the Trojan war, and to have written in the Phœnician language. K. O. Müller, Hist. of the Lit. of Anc. Greece, III. 175. (Handbook.)

Philoctetes (fil-ok-tē'tēz). [Gr. Φιλοκτήτης.] In Greek legend, a Greek warrior in the Trojan war, famous as an archer. He was the friend and armor-bearer of Hercules, and set fire to the funeral pile of that hero. He was wounded either by a serpent or accidentally by one of the poisoned arrows given him by Hercules, and was left to die on Lemnos. The legends about him vary. He was made the subject of a play by Sophocles.

Philolaus (fil-o-lā'us). [Gr. Φιλόλαος.] Lived in the 5th century B. C. A Greek philosopher, one of the chief of the Pythagoreans. Fragments of his works are extant.

Philomela (fil-o-mē'lā). [Gr. Φιλομήλα.] In Greek legend, the daughter of Pandion, sister of Procne, and sister-in-law of Tereus. She was metamorphosed into a nightingale or a swallow. See Procne.

Philomela. A novel by Robert Greene, published in 1592.

The most beautiful, however, and best known of Greene's prose tales is his "Phil-au-la" otherwise called "Lady Fitzwater's Nightingale" in honor of the Lady Fitzwater to whom it is addressed. "In my penned," as the author says in the dedication, "to oppose women's chastity."

Phobos (fō'bos). [Gr. φόβος, fear: in mythology personified as the son of Ares and brother of Deimos.] The inner of the two satellites of the planet Mars, discovered by Asaph Hall at Washington, in Aug., 1877. This extraordinary body revolves in the plane of the equator of Mars, at a distance of only about 3700 miles from the surface of the planet. At the equinoxes it is in eclipse about one fifth of the time; at the solstices it does not suffer eclipse. It revolves about its primary in 7h. 39m. 14s.; and, as Mars revolves on its axis in over 24 hours, the satellite must appear to an observer on Mars to rise in the west and set in the east. At a station on the equator of Mars (where the satellite always passes through the zenith), it will set in 1h. 16m. 28s. of period, pass only 3h. 39m. above the horizon.

Phocæa (fō-sē'ā). [Gr. Φώκαια.] In ancient geography, a city in Ionia, Asia Minor, situated on the Ægean Sea 28 miles northwest of Smyrna. The inhabitants emigrated in large numbers after an attack by the forces of Cyrus the Great in the 6th century B. C. It was the mother-city of Marseilles.

Phokis. See Phocis.

Phorbas (fôr'bas). [Gr. Φόρβας.] In Greek legend, son of Lapithes. He freed the Rhodians from a plague of serpents, and was honored by them as a hero. He was placed in the heavens as the constellation Ophiuchus (the Serpent-holder). According to another legend he was a famous boxer, but having challenged the gods to contend with him was slain by Apollo.

Phorcyads (fôr'si-adz), or Phorcids (fôr'sidz), The. [Gr. Φορκίδες.] See the extract.

Three daughters of Phorkys (Darkness) and Keto (The Abyss). Their names were Deino, Pephredo, and Enyo: Hesiod, in his Theogony, gives only the two last. They were also called the Graiæ. They were said to have in common but one eye and one tooth, which they used alternately, and to dwell at the uttermost end of the earth, where neither sun nor moon beheld them. They represent the climax of all which Greek imagination has created of horrible and repulsive. Taylor, Notes to Faust.

Goethe transforms Mephistopheles into a Phorcyad in the second part of Faust.]

Photius (fō'shi-us). Died 892 (891 ?). A celebrated Byzantine prelate and scholar. He held the lay offices of captain of the body guard and chief secretary to the emperors Michael III. and Basilius the Macedonian, and Leo the philosopher; was raised to the patriarchal dignity in 857 in place of Ignatius, and held the office for ten years, when he was deposed. Restored in 877, he remained in office till 886, when he was again deposed. He died in banishment. His chief works are "Myriobiblion," a collection of extracts from and abridgments of 280 volumes of classical authors, the originals of which are now in large part lost; and "Amphilochia," a collection of questions and answers on difficult points in Scripture.

Phrygia (frij'i-ā). [Gr. Φρυγία.] In ancient geography, a country in Asia Minor, of varying boundaries. In the Persian period it comprised Lesser Phrygia on the Hellespont, and Great Phrygia in the interior, bounded by Bithynia and Paphlagonia on the north, the Halys on the east, the Taurus on the south, and Mysia, Lydia, and Caria on the west. Later the Galatians settled in the northeast portion. The inhabitants (Phrygians) are of undetermined origin. The country was overrun by the Cimmerians in the 7th century B. C., and was ruled later by Lydia, Persia, Macedon, and Rome.

Phryne (frī'nē). [Gr. Φρύνη.] Lived in the middle of the 4th century B. C. A celebrated Athenian hetaira. she is supposed to have been the model of the picture "Aphrodite Anadyomene" by Apelles, and of the statue of the Cnidian Aphrodite by Praxiteles. According to the legend, she was defended, on a capital charge, by her lover Hyperides; and when he failed to move the judges by his oratory, he bade her uncover her bosom, and thus secured her acquittal.

Phryne before the Areopagus. A painting by Gérôme (1861).

Phrynichus (frin'i-kus). [Gr. Φρύνιχος.] Lived at the end of the 5th century B. C. A poet of the old Attic comedy, a rival of Aristophanes.

Phrynichus of Athens (512–476) still used only one actor, but improved the organisation of the chorus, sometimes subdividing it into smaller bands, one of which might represent a group of maidens, another a group of elders, or the like. One of his choral performances represented the "Capture of Miletus," the chief town in the first half year of the Ionian revolt (494 B. C.). The Athenians were so moved. Herodotus says, that they fined the poet, who had set before them the sufferings of their kinsmen, "for reminding them of their own misfortunes." In his "Phœnisse" (476 B. C.) Phrynichus celebrated the deeds of Athens in the Persian wars: one group of the chorus represented Phœnician women who had been sent to the Persian court, while another group represented Persian elders.

Phut (fōt). See the extract.

The name which follows that of Mizraim in Genesis is still enveloped in mystery. Since the days of Josephus it has been the fashion to identify Phut with the Libyans; but this cannot be correct, since the Lehabim or Libyans are included among the sons of Mizraim. A broken fragment of the annals of Nebuchadnezzar has at last shed a little light on the question. We there read that the Baby-

Ionian king in the 37th year of his reign marched against Egypt, and defeated the army of Amasis, the Egyptian monarch, as well as the soldiers of the city of Phut-Yavan or "Phut of the Ionians." We know that Amasis was a Philhellene; he had granted special privileges to the Greeks, had surrounded himself with a Greek body-guard, and had removed the camp of the Greek mercenaries from the neighbourhood of Pelusium to that of Memphis. In "the city of Phut Yavan," therefore, we must see some city to which the Greek mercenaries were considered in a special manner to belong. It may have been the Greek colony of Kyrénê, from whence Amasis had obtained a wife.

Sayce, Races of the O. T., p. 54.

Phyllis (fil'is). [Gr.Φυλλίς.] 1. In Greek legend, the betrothed wife of Demophon. Because he failed to keep his promise to come and marry her on a certain day, she hung herself, and was metamorphosed into an almond-tree.

Physiologus (fiz-i-ol'ō-gus). A bestiary, or collection of allegorical fables on animals, these were widely read in the middle ages. The word was sometimes used as if it were the name of the author.

A Physiologus ascribed to Epiphanius was published by Ponce de Leon at Rome in 1587. In the Western Church there is reference to a Latin Physiologus, ascribed to St. Ambrose, which was condemned as spuryphal and heretical by Pope Gelasius II. in a council of the year 496. There are several Latin manuscripts of such works, but none earlier than the eighth century. They are to be found also in Old High German prose of the eleventh century, and in the Old French of Philippe de Thaun at the beginning of the twelfth century. Another of the Old French specimens is "Le Bestiaire Divin" of Guillaume, Clerc de Normandie. Another is "Le Bestiaire d'Amour" of Richard de Fournival. Pierre de Beauvais' Latin Bestiarius found their way also into the "Speculum Naturale" of Vincent of Beauvais. Our Old English Bestiary contains few Norman words in its vocabulary; and Dr. Morris believes that it may have been written by the author of the poems of "Genesis" and "Exodus."

Pierrot (pyer-rō'). A typical character in French pantomime. He dresses in loose white clothes with enormous white buttons, and his face is whitened; he is a coward and thief, capable of every crime incapable of a good action, and absolutely without moral sense. The present Pierrot was created by Gaspard Deburau under the Restoration; previous to this he had been a gayer and more insignificant personage, a cross between a fool and an ingenu. Lerousse.

Piers Plowman. See Vision of Piers Plowman.

Piers Plowman's Crede. A satirical alliterative poem, after the style of "The Vision of Piers Plowman," written about 1394. See Plowman's Tale.

Pietà (pē-ā-tä'). [It., 'pity.'] A title of numerous pictures, bas-reliefs, etc., representing the compassionate lamentation of the Virgin and other women over the body of Christ after the descent from the Cross. (a) A painting by Van Dyck, in the old Pinakothek at Munich. The body of Christ lies on some drapery spread on the ground, the head and shoulders supported by the Virgin. The cross is behind, and at the left are three mourning angels. (b) A vigorous painting by Andrea del Sarto (about 1518), in the Imperial Gallery at Vienna. Christ's body lies on outspread yellow drapery, mourned over by the weeping Virgin: an angel supports the head, and another holds the accessories of the passion. (c) A painting by Van Dyck (1628), in the museum at Antwerp, Belgium. The Virgin holds on her lap the head of the dead Christ, whose face is drawn with suffering. St. John points out the wound in one hand to two grieving angels. (d) The masterpiece of Quentin Massys (1508), in the museum at Antwerp, Belgium. It is a triptych. On the chief panel Christ is seen borne to the tomb, supported by Joseph of Armathea and St. John. The Virgin kneels by the body, and near her stand the Magdalen, St. John, and Mary Salome. The drawing is somewhat rigid in the effort to attain anatomical exactness. On the side panels are painted the martyrdoms of St. John the Baptist and St. John the Evangelist.

Pietermaritzburg (pē-ter-mär'its-bûrg), almost always called Maritzburg (mär'its-bûrg). The capital of Natal, South Africa, situated 47 miles northwest of Durban. Population (1891), 17,500.

Pilaya (pē-lī'ä). A right-hand tributary of the Pilcomayo, in Bolivia. Length, about 500 miles.

Pilcomayo (pēl-kō-mī'ō). A river rising in southern Bolivia and flowing through the Gran Chaco, where it separates western Paraguay from the Argentine Republic. It is the largest branch of the Paraguay, which it runs opposite Asuncion. In the lower it is very crooked and shallow, and obstructed by sandbars, the lower portion is brackish. Many vain attempts have been made to explore it, with the object of opening a route to Bolivia; a scheme now generally believed to be impracticable. The Frenchspeaking Creoles, who first descend the river in 1862, was killed by the Indians, with his party. Length unknown (probably about 1,400 miles).

Pilgrim, The. 1. A play by Fletcher, produced at court in 1621 and printed in 1647. In 1700 Sir John Vanbrugh produced an alteration which was revived in 1812.—2. A tragedy by Thomas Killigrew, printed in 1664.

Pilgrimage of Grace. An insurrection in Yorkshire and Lincolnshire in 1537, headed by Robert Aske. It was occasioned by the ecclesiastical and political reforms of Henry VIII. The rebels occupied York, where they were joined by the Archbishop. Their number having increased to 30,000, they proceeded to Pontefract, where they were induced to disband by the representations of the royal commissioners. Finding themselves deceived, they soon assembled under Sir Francis Bigod. Martial law was declared in the north, and the rising was suppressed with great severity.

Pilgrim Fathers, The. The founders of Plymouth Colony, Massachusetts, in 1620.

Pilgrims, Chaucer's. See Canterbury Tales.

Pilgrims of the Rhine. A descriptive work by Bulwer, published in 1834.

Pilgrim's Progress, The. A famous allegory, by John Bunyan, which recounts the adventures of the hero Christian in journeying from the City of Destruction to the heavenly Jerusalem. It was composed while Bunyan was in prison between 1666 and 1675. The first part was printed in 1678. A second part (1684) narrates the similar travels of Christiana, Christian's wife.

Pilgrim Sale, The. A poem thought by Thynne to have been Chaucer's. He printed it, but it was not published, being objected to by the bishops. It was lost, apparently; and, attention having been directed to it, it was searched for in vain for over two hundred years. Tyrwhitt found part of it, examined it, and it disappeared again. At length it was rediscovered and printed by the Chaucer Society. It was found to be by some one familiarized with Chaucer's work, but writing after 1532. Lounsbury.

Pillars of Hercules. In ancient geography, the two opposite promontories Calpe (Gibraltar) in Europe and Abyla in Africa, situated at the eastern extremity of the Strait of Gibraltar. Hence, figuratively, at the outer limit of the Mediterranean into the unknown Atlantic. According to one of several explanations of the name, they were supposed to have been torn asunder by Hercules. Compare Ballads.

Pilpay (pil'pā) or Bidpai (bid'pī). The "Fables of Pilpay," so-called, are translated into "Kalilah and Dimnah," the Arabic translation of the Pahlavi translation of the Sanskrit original of the Panchatantra. See kalilah and Dimnah. According to the Arabic preface to Kalilah and Dimnah, the first king of the Indian empire, after the death of the governor appointed by Alexander the Great, was very wicked. To reclaim him, Bidpai composed his fables. This Wise man is called in Arabic Bidpai, in Syriac Bidpai, in Persian Pilpai, and, through the Pahlavi to the Sanskrit as Vidyapati "master of learning." Accordingly Bidpai, which has become Bidpay in modern books, is the proper name of the sage to whom is applied the marked position of court scholar to a Indian prince. In fact no Pilpay that he composed, or that was narrated to Pilpay, the Indian Sage, is known. Although La Fontaine gives references to the Indian sources.

Pilsen (pil'sen). A city in Bohemia, situated at the junction of the Mies and Radbusa, in lat. 49° 45′ N., long. 13° 23′ E. It is the second city of Bohemia; has various manufactures; and is especially famous for the manufacture and export of Pilsener beer. Pindar (pin'där). [L. Pindarus, Gr. Πινδαρος.] Born at Cynoscephalæ, near Thebes, Greece, about 522 B. C.; died at Argos, 443 B. C. The greatest of the Greek lyric poets. He resided chiefly at Thebes, but spent about four years at the court of Hieron in Syracuse. Little is known of his life. See the extract.

The remains of Pindar's work represent almost every kind of lyric poem. The fragments may be classified as follows: 1. Hymns to Persephone, to Fortune, and in praise of Thebes and the gods; 2. Paeans to Apollo; 3. Dithyrambs to Zeus of Dodona. 4. Choral dithyrambs to Dionysus. 5. Processional songs, for the people at Delos and at Ægina. 5. Choral songs for antidoxa: one addressed to "Pan, lord of Arcadia, watcher of the mountain-peak of Cyllene;" 6. Choral dances-songs — "hyporchemes," as the Greeks called them — in which the words were accompanied by a lively dance or pantomime suggestive of the theme: they arose from the early Cretan war-dances, and were used especially in the worship of Apollo as a relief to the solemn paean. One of these was written for the Delphians, and so connected with a popular myth-relating to Fortune, and in praise of Thebes and the gods; 7. Encomia: laudatory odes (in praise of men, and thus distinguished from hymns in praise of gods); sung by the festive troop or comus. 8. Scolia: festive songs to be sung at banquets by a comus or festive troop. 9. Threnes, to be sung to the flute with choral dance. Besides the fragments, we have forty-four complete Epinicia, or Odes of Victory, in which Pindar celebrated victories in great national games. Fourteen odes belong to the games at Olympia, held once in four years: the prize was a wreath of wild olive. Twelve odes belong to the Pythian games, held at Delphi in honour of Apollo, once in four years, in the 3d year of each Olympiad: the prize was a wreath of laurel. Seven odes belong to the Nemean games, held at Nemea, in honour of Zeus, once in two years, the 2d and 4th years of each Olympiad: the prize was a wreath of pine. Eleven odes belong to the Isthmian games, held at the Isthmus of Corinth, in honour of Poseidon, once in two years, in the 1st and 3d years of each Olympiad: the prize was a wreath of pine. Among all these odes of which the dates can be fixed, the earliest is the 10th Pythian, in 502 B. C.; the latest, the 5th Olympian, in 452 B. C.

Pine Bluff (pin bluf). The capital of Jefferson County, Arkansas, situated on the Arkansas 38 miles south southeast of Little Rock. It exports cotton. Population (1880), 9,952.

Pine (pīn) Islands. A group of the Florida Keys, situated northeast of Key West.

Pinel (pe-nel'), Philippe. Born at St.-André, Tarn, France, April 20, 1745; died at Paris, Oct. 25, 1826. A French physician, director of the insane asylum at Bicêtre (1793) and the Salpetrière (1794); noted for the improvements which he effected in the treatment of the insane. He wrote "Nosographie philosophique" (1798), etc.

Pinelo (pē-nā'lō), Antonio de Leon. Born probably at Cordoba, now in the Argentine Republic, about 1590; died at Seville, Spain, about 1655. A Spanish lawyer and author. He was judge of the tribunal of the Casa de Contratacion at Seville, and historical secretary of the Council of the Indies. In 1637 he was appointed royal historiographer. Employed to codify the colonial laws, he completed, in 1635, his "Recopilacion general de las leyes de las Indias," made authoritative by royal order in 1680, and published in 1681 (Madrid, 4 vols.). It was several times revised. Pinelo also published various works on America and on colonial law; a life of Toribio, Archbishop of Lima (1653); and "Biblioteca Oriental y Occidental, nautica y geografica" (Madrid, 1629): the first bibliography of the Spanish colonies. There is a revised edition by Gonzalez de Barcia (3 vols. 1737-38).

Pinerolo (pē-ne-rō'lō), F. Pignerol (pēn-ye-rōl'). A town in the province of Turin, Italy, 22 miles southwest of Turin. It was taken from Savoy by Francis I. of France, and held until 1574; and was again taken by the French about 1630, and held as an important fortress until the close of the century. Population (1881), 12,281; commune, 17,492.

Pinerolo, Pacification of. A treaty concluded by the English Commonwealth under Cromwell with France in 1655, providing for the cessation of the Waldensian persecution by the Duke of Savoy.

Pines (pīnz), Isle of, Sp. Isla de Pinos (ēs'lä dā pē'nōs). An island of the West Indies, belonging to Spain, situated 40 miles south of the western part of Cuba, of which it is a political dependency. Chief place, Nueva Gerona. It was discovered by Columbus in 1494, and was long notorious as a resort of pirates. Area, 1,214 square miles. Population, about 2,500.

Pines, Isle of, F. Île des Pins (ēl dā pañ). A small island, a French penal station, situated in the South Pacific southeast of New Caledonia.

Pine-tree State. The State of Maine: so called from the pine-tree in its coat of arms.

Ping Yang. See Pieng-yan.

Pinini (pē-nē-nē'). [A corruption of the Sp. Pygmeos, pygmies or dwarfs.] The name given by some of the Pueblo Indians to a mythical tribe of small men who are said to have invaded some of the Pueblo villages in the times long previous to the Spanish conquest. The tale may be a modern adaptation of classical mythological legends to Indian tradition.

Pinkerton (ping'kėr-ton), John. Born at Edinburgh, Feb. 17, 1758; died May 10, 1826. A Scottish historical critic, and miscellaneous writer. He published "Two Dithyrambic Odes on Enthusiasm and Laughter" (1782), an "Essay on Medals" (1784), "Ancient Scottish Poems" (1786), a "Dissertation on the Origin and Progress of the Scythians or Goths" (1787), "Enquiry into the History of Scotland" (1790), "Iconographica Scotica" (1795-97), etc.

Pinsk (pinsk). A town in the government of Minsk, Russia, situated among marshes on the Pina, 140 miles south-southwest of Minsk. It is an important center of river transit trade. Population (1890), 32,480.

Pinta (pēn'tä), La. One of the smaller vessels of Columbus on his first voyage. It was a little larger than the Niña (which see), and was commanded by Martin Alonso Pinzon. See Pinzon.

Pinto. See Pakawa.

Pinto (pēn'tō), Aníbal. Born at Santiago, 1825; died at Valparaiso, 1884. A Chilean statesman, son of General F. A. Pinto. He was a moderate liberal in politics; was minister of war and marine under Erazuriz 1871-76, and succeeded him as president Sept. 18, 1876-Sept. 18, 1881. Pinto was the first declared liberal elected to the presidency after 1830. During his term the war with Bolivia and Peru was commenced (1879). See Pacific, War of the.

Pinto (pēn'tō), Fernão Mendes. Born near Coimbra, Portugal, about 1509; died near Lisbon, 1583. A Portuguese adventurer and traveler in the East (China and Japan). He wrote an account of his travels entitled "Peregrinação" (1614).

Pinto (pēn'tō), Francisco Antonio. Born at Santiago, 1785; died there, July 18, 1858. A Chilean general and politician. He was diplomatic agent of the republic at Buenos Ayres and in England 1811-17; subsequently served with distinction in Charcas 1818-21, and in Peru 1822-23; and was minister of the interior and of foreign relations in 1824. Early in 1827 he was elected by congress vice-president, and on the resignation of Freire became president May 8, 1827. He resigned in July, 1829; two months later he was deposed by a regular election; but, a revolution being imminent, he again resigned, Nov. 2, 1829. He was the liberal candidate for the presidency in 1831.

Pinto, Serpa. See Serpa Pinto.

Pinturicchio (pēn-tō-rēk'kē-ō) (Bernardino di Betti), Born at Perugia, Italy, 1454: died at Siena, Italy, Sept. 11, 1513. An Italian painter, of the school of Perugino: noted for his frescos and panels. Many of his principal works are at Rome (in the Vatican and Church of Sta. Maria del Popolo) and at Siena.

Pinzgau (pints'gou). The upper valley of the Salza, in Salzburg, Austria-Hungary, situated southwest of the city of Salzburg. It is divided into the Upper, Middle, and Lower Pinzgau.

Pinzon (pēn-thōn'), Francisco Martin. Brother of Martin Alonso Pinzon, and pilot of his vessel, the Pinta.

Pinzon, Martin Alonso. Born at Palos about 1441: died there, 1493. A Spanish navigator. He was the head of a family of ship-builders in Palos, and had made many voyages. There is a story that, in one of these, in 1477, he was about Cape de Verde from Africa to the coast of Brazil; but this is generally discredited. Another story is that he found in Rome an old manuscript which he gave to Columbus and in which it was stated that land might be reached by sailing westward. It is more probable that he joined Columbus in his voyage of 1492 because he was part owner of the smaller vessels. He commanded the Pinta. In Nov., 1492, he parted company with Columbus on the coast of Cuba; was the first to discover Haiti; and rejoined the admiral on the coast of that island. In Jan., 1493, Columbus afterward asserted that he had deserted with the intention of returning to Spain. During the return voyage the Pinta was separated from the Niña in a storm, Feb. 14, and eventually reached Bayona, a port of Galicia; thence Pinzon sent a letter to the sovereigns with an account of the discovery, and sailed on to Palos, reaching it on the same day as Columbus (March 15). His death, shortly after, is said to have been hastened by chagrin because Columbus received the honor of the discovery.

Pinzon, Vicente Yañez. Born at Palos about 1460: died there, in 1524. A Spanish navigator, brother of Martin Alonso Pinzon. He commanded the Niña in the first voyage of Columbus in 1492. Early in Dec., 1499 (according to some, Jan. 13, 1500), he left Palos in command of four caravels. Steering west, he crossed the equator, being the first Spanish commander to do so; struck the coast of Brazil probably near Cape St. Augustine; thence followed it northward and northwestward, discovering the mouth of the Amazon; and after passing between Trinidad and the mainland, and touching at Española, returned to Spain in Sept., 1500. Some suppose that Vespucci was with him on this voyage, but he was probably with Ojeda. (See Vespucci.) In 1506 Pinzon was associated with Solis in an exploration of the Gulf of Honduras and a small portion of southwestern Yucatan. In 1508 he was again with Solis in an exploration of the eastern coast of South America, from Cape St. Augustine southward probably as far as lat. 40°. See Solis, Juan Diaz de.

Piojes (pē-ō-hās'). Indians of eastern Ecuador (a region claimed by Colombia), on the lower Napo and the Putumayo or Içá. Those on the former river are often called Santa Marias, from a mission village in which many of them were gathered; they have no knowledge of the horde on the Putumayo. These Indians are agriculturists, skilful canoemen and fishermen, and industrious; they formerly traded to the whites, but maintain a semi-independence. By their language they are generally classed with the Betoya stock, but the relationship is doubtful.

Piombino (pē'om-bō'nō). A seaport in the province of Pisa, Italy, situated on a promontory projecting into the Mediterranean, 45 miles south by east of Leghorn, and opposite Elba. Population (1881), commune, 4,076.

Piombino, Principality of. A former small principality, adjoining and including the town of Piombino.

Piombo (pē-om'bō), Fra Sebastiano del. Born in Venice (?), 1485; died at Rome, June 21, 1547. A painter of the Venetian school. His real name was Luciani, but he was commonly called del Piombo from his office of keeper of the leaden seals, which he held under Clement VII. and Paul III. He was a pupil of Giovanni Bellini, and afterward of Giorgione, and was called to Rome about 1509 by Agostino Chigi to assist in the decorations of the Farnesina with frescos. Meantime his portraits in oil had won him fame. Among the best of this period are the so-called "Fornarina" in the Uffizi at Florence. Piombo was intimately associated with Michelangelo, and is said to have painted the "Resurrection of Lazarus" in the National Gallery, London, with his assistance. In 1527 he went to Venice, and there probably painted the portrait of Andrea Doria, now in the Doria Palace at Rome. He returned to Rome in 1529. In 1531 he became keeper of the seals and an ecclesiastic.

Pioneers, The. A story by James Fenimore Cooper, published in 1823.

Piotrkow (pē-yo-trē'kov), G. Petrikau (pā'trē-kou). 1. A government in Russian Poland, bordering on Prussia. Area, 4,729 square miles. Population, 1,091,282.—2. The capital of the government of Piotrkow, situated 84 miles southwest of Warsaw. It is one of the oldest Polish towns. Population (1884), 24,800.

Piove di Sacco (pē-ō've dē sāk'kō). A town in the province of Padua, Italy, 18 miles southwest of Venice. Population (1881), 5,137; commune, 8,606.

Piozzi (pi-oz'i; It. pron. pē-ot'sē), Mrs. (Hester Lynch Salisbury; Mrs. Thrale). Born at Bodville, Carnarvonshire, Jan. 27, 1741; died at Clifton, England, May 2, 1821. An English lady, a friend of Dr. Johnson. She was well educated in Latin and Greek and the modern languages. In 1763 she married Henry Thrale, a brewer of Southwark. In 1764 she met Dr. Johnson, and an intimacy began which lasted for 20 years. Mr. Thrale died on April 4, 1781, and on July 25, 1784, she married Piozzi, an Italian musician. Her anecdotes of and correspondence with Dr. Johnson are second in interest only to Boswell's "Life."

Pip (pip). Nickname of Philip Pirrip, the hero of Dickens's "Great Expectations."

Pipchin (pip'chin), Mrs. In Dickens's "Dombey and Son," a disagreeable old woman, proprietress of an "infantine boarding-house of a very select description" at Brighton, where little Paul Dombey was sent for his health.

Piræus, or Peiræus (pī-rē'us): also Piræeus. [Gr. Πειραιεύς.] The seaport of Athens, situated on the Saronic Gulf 5 miles southwest of Athens. It is one of the chief ports of Greece. It was founded by Themistocles and Pericles; was destroyed by Sulla in 86 B. C.; and has been rebuilt in the present century. It was in ancient times connected with Athens by the "Long Walls," and is now connected by a railway. Population (1889), 34,527.

Pirano (pē-rä'nō). A seaport in Istria, Austria-Hungary, situated on the Gulf of Triest 14 miles southwest of Triest. Near it, in 1877, the Venetians first defeated the Genoese and Imperialists. Population (1890), commune, 12,926.

Piran Round. An ancient theater in Cornwall.

This relic of antiquity is called Piran Round. It consists of a circular embankment about ten feet high, sloping backwards, cut out into rude forms of seats or standing-places. This embankment encloses a level area of grassy ground, and stands in the middle of a flat, wild heath. A couple of thousand spectators could look down from the seats upon the grassy circus which formed a stage of more than a hundred feet in diameter. Here, in very early times, sports were played and combats fought out, and rustic council-assembled. The ancient Cornish Mysteries here drew tears and laughter from the mixed audiences of the day. They were popular as late as the period of Shakspeare. Doran, English Stage, I. 30.

Pirithous (pi-rith'o-us). [Gr. Πειρίθους.] In Greek legend, one of the Lapithæ, a son of Zeus (or Ixion), and a friend of Theseus. The famous battle with the Centaurs took place on the occasion of his wedding.

Pirmasens (pir'mä-sens). A town in the Rhine Palatinate, Bavaria, situated 44 miles north by west of Strasburg. The leading industry is the manufacture of boots and shoes. Here, Sept. 14, 1793, the Prussians under the Duke of Brunswick defeated the French under Moreau. Population (1890), 22,041.

Pirna (pir'nä). A town in the kingdom of Saxony, situated on the Elbe 12 miles southeast of Dresden. It is a manufacturing town; exports sandstone; and contains the castle of Sonnenstein. It suffered severely in the Thirty Years' and Seven Years' wars. Population (1890), 13,000.

Pirnatza (pėr-nät'sä), or Dhipotamo (dē-pot'ä-mō). The chief river in Messenia, Greece; the ancient Pamisus. It flows into the Gulf of Messenia west of Kalamata.

Piro (pē'rō). [Pl., also Piros.] A division of the Tanoan linguistic stock of North American Indians. Their territory was on the upper and lower course of the Rio Grande, from Senecu to Sevilleta in New Mexico. The tribal organization was smashed in the Pueblo revolt of 1680 when most of its members joined the Tigua in their flight to the vicinity of El Paso, Texas, on which site they established a village, naming it Senecu after their former pueblo in the north. About 60 still reside at Senecu del Sur. See Tanoan.

Piron (pe-rōn'), Alexis. Born at Dijon, France, July 9, 1689; died at Paris, Jan. 21, 1773. A French epigrammatist. He also wrote the comedy "Métromanie" (1738), vaudevilles, etc.

Piros (pē'rōs), locally called Chontaquiros (chōn-tä-kē'rōs) or Siriminches (sē-rē-mēn'-chās). 1. An Indian tribe of eastern Peru, in the forest region bordering the Apurimac and Ucayale rivers, between 10° and 12° S. lat. They were formerly numerous, but between 1853 and 1877 most of them were gathered into mission villages; but they subsequently returned to a wild life. They were long notorious for their raids on other tribes, capturing slaves (women for wives), but the present slaves which they sold to the whites. Only one or two thousand remain, and they are gradually submitting to white influence. The Piros are the lowest in culture of the Indians of eastern Peru, its westernmost tribe. This is one of the tribes loosely called Chunchos by the Peruvians.

2. See Piro.

Pirot (pē-rōt'). A town in Servia, situated on a head stream of the Nishava, in lat. 43° 14′ N., long. 22° 35′ E. It was ceded by Turkey to Servia in 1878. Here, Nov. 26-27, 1885, the Bulgarians defeated the Servians. Population (1891), 9,959.

Pirua (pē-rō'wä). The traditional name of the rulers of a very ancient people, the Hatun Runas, who occupied the highlands of Peru and Bolivia previous to the rise of the Inca dynasty. That such a people existed is evident from the remains of Cyclopean architecture of a type different from and older than the Inca edifices: see Tiahuanaco and Sacsahuaman, and all the traditions collected by authors seem after the conquest are in pointing to a powerful kingdom centered around the Titicaca basin, and the Inca to have risen into power at Cuzco. The first Piruas are said to have come from the south, and they have been connected with the Aymara nation, but at that time the Aymara and the Quichuas may have formed one race. Montesinos gives a list of 65 chiefs or "kings" of the Pirua line, and this list, long discredited, has received incidental support from the mention of some of the names in recently discovered manuscripts. As the Pirua line ceased before the 10th century, the list, if correct, carries it back to a time earlier than the Christian era.

The Piruas governed a vast empire, erected imperishable Cyclopean edifices, and developed a complicated civilization, which is dimly indicated to us by the numerous symbolical sculptures on the monolith at Tiahuanaco. They also, to a large extent, domesticated wild plants under cultivation and domesticated the animals of the lofty Andean plateau. But it is remarkable that the skeletons of Lake Titicaca, which are almost treeless, and whose corn will not ripen, should have been chosen as the cemetery of this most ancient civilization. Yet the ruins of Tiahuanaco undoubtedly establish the fact that the temperature of the Piruas was on the lofty site ever selected for the seat of a great empire.

Pisa (pē'zä or pē'sä). A province of Tuscany, Italy. Area, 1,179 square miles. Population (1891), 302,349.

Pisa, F. Pise (pēz). The capital of the province of Pisa, Italy, situated on the Arno, 6 miles from the sea, in lat. 43° 43′ N., long. 10° 23′ E.: the ancient Pisæ and Colonia Julia Pisana. It is now a writer by the river and is joined with the seaport by the railway, a navigable canal, and a tramway. It is now a walled town of 3.3 miles in circuit. Its bridge was built in 1867, and consecrated in 1875. Its port has docks 1,312 feet long, 164 across, and four basins of 27 across the transept and of 164 feet in length. The cathedral, the nave, The interior is striped with alternate black and white marble, columns, and pilasters, and painted dome at the crossing. The exterior is also striped with mosaic on gold ground, in parts even more. The façade, in alternate colored, is in the 12th century. It has superposed arcades, with small columns, and a similar arcade is carried around the church under the roof. The bronze doors of the façade are by Bonanno; productions by Giovanni da Bologna, that of the south transept is Romanesque, with cusped arches in sunken panels. The sculptured marble pulpit, of the type of that in the baptistery, was the masterpiece of Giovanni Pisano: it was shattered in the fire of 1595, and has lately been restored. There are in it fine paintings, particularly Giovanni St. Agnes by Andrea del Sarto, and admirable choirstalls and church furniture. The baptistery, one of the most beautiful of Italian buildings, is circular and domed, with two tiers of superposed Pisan arcades and above these, below the dome, coupled round windows with foliated pointed cusping. The lower tier has round-arched windows in deep arches, and the 12th century: the parts above are later. The little pendentive of the second tier are panels two and two, the lower of which is round and circle tied to dome above separated by slender pinnacles. The interior of the building is occupied by the octagonal font of 1246 by Guido da Como, with bas-reliefs of the Baptism and messages on its panels. Its raised basin, however, is the famous pulpit (1260) of Nicola Pisano. This is hexagonal, raised on seven columns, three of them resting on marble beasts. Three have resting on lions, and the central one supported by a fantastic group of men and animals. One side is taken by the stair; the five others bear remarkable reliefs from the life of Christ, strongly classical in technique. At one angle is an angle forming a lectern. The dome of the baptistery is 117 feet elevated to the top. The campanile, or leaning tower, is also circular, and stands, that at the base solid with a wall-arcade, the six above lower, and surrounded within the small columned arcades with galleries. Its inclination is 13 feet to the second, since it has no exterior arcade: its wall-arcade is interrupted by six large arches to allow the sound of the bells to escape. The campanile, begun in 1174, with its superposed tiers of small columned arcades, is the perfection Pisan type of mediæval architecture. It is 181 feet high, 52 in diameter at the base, and inclines 13 feet 8 inches toward the south. About half of the building took place during the construction, and the efforts made to correct it by diminishing the height of the stages on the north side resulted in a curve of the whole. The spire originally designed was not built, on account of the continued sinking of the foundation. San Paolo a Ripa d'Arno was the original cathedral, founded by Guglielmo, and altered in the 12th century. The façade is built of gray, yellow, and black marble: it has five blind arches below, three of them inclosing doors, and three tiers of columned galleries above. The interior has granite columns with quaintly carved white marble capitals. In the cloister there is a highly picturesque and curious hexagonal structure called the "Sepolcro," apparently a baptistery of the old cathedral. The university, organized in 1343, had 64 instructors and 925 students in 1891. The building, begun in 1472, was completed in 1486, and enlarged by Cosimo de' Medici. Pisa was probably an Etruscan origin. It was allied with Rome, and of some importance under the empire. In the 11th century it was a maritime republic, rivaling the other commercial powers of the Mediterranean. It conquered Sardinia, Corsica, and the Balearic Islands, took important part in the Crusades, was Ghibelline, and at war with Genoa and Florence; was beaten at Meloria in 1284, and lost many of its possessions and importance after that. Dante mentions it, became independent in 1494; and resisted attacks by Florence in 1499, 1504, and 1506, but finally submitted in 1509. It had its most important period of development of architecture and sculpture. Galileo was born there. Population (1892), 66,000.

Pisa, Council of. An ecclesiastical council held at Pisa in 1409 for the purpose of healing the papal schism. It deposed the rival popes Gregory XII. and Benedict XIII. Alexander V. was elected by the cardinals.

Pisanio (pē-zä'nyō). A servant of Posthumus in Shakspere's "Cymbeline."

Steward and constant adviser to the queen calls him, and as he himself wishes to be. Pisanio unites the cunning of the serpent with the harmlessness of the dove. His singular position is the school that he is truest where he is most untrue.

Gervinus, Shakspeare Commentaries (tr. by F. L. Bunnett, ed. 1880), p. 678.

Pisano (pē-zä'nō), Andrea (Andrea da Pontaderra). Born 1270; died at Florence about 1349. An Italian sculptor. He was early apprenticed to Giovanni Pisano, and devoted much time to the study of the antique sarcophagi in the Campo Santo. At 35 years of age he is said to have visited Venice where he made several statues for the façade of San Marco, and made designs for the mosaic, subsequently finished by Filippo Calendario. After his return from Venice he made the bronze door of the baptistery in Florence, which is his chief and enduring title to fame (finished 1330). He also executed the bas-reliefs designed by Giotto for the lower story of the campanile, and some figures on Arnolfo's façade of the duomo. He strengthened the Palazzo Vecchio with great walls and fortifications to render it a safe residence for Walter de Brienne, ducha duke of Athens, whom the Florentines had made governor of the city.

Pisano, Giovanni. Born at Pisa, 1240; died 1320. An Italian architect and sculptor, son of Niccola Pisano. From 1265 to 1267 he worked with his father upon the pulpit in Siena. In 1268 he went to Naples to design the church of the Franciscans and the episcopal palace. In 1273 he went to Pisa on the death of his father. At this time he finished the Oratory of Santa Maria del Porto into the present Church of Santa Maria della Spina, the first edifice built in Italy in the pointed style, and built the first and most beautiful Campo Santo in Italy: in the Campo Santo are still many works of Giovanni. About 1280 he made the monument of Pope Urban IV. at Perugia, and the shrine of San Donato at Arezzo in 1280.

Pisano, Niccola. Born at Pisa between 1205 and 1207; died at Pisa, 1278. A noted Italian sculptor and architect, said to have been a native of Puglia or of Pietro da Siena, a notary. He founded a new school of sculpture in Italy. When about 15 years old he was employed as architect by the emperor Frederick II., and went with him to Naples, where he worked on the Castel Capuano and Castel dell' Uovo in 1223. He designed the basilica of St. Anthony of Padua in 1231, and in 1237 made his first known essay in sculpture in the altar-relievo of the Deposition, still in the tympanum of the arch over a side door of San Martino at Lucca. About 1248 he built the Santa Trinità at Florence, the San Domenico at Arezzo, the duomo at Volterra, and the Pieve and Santa Margherita at Cortona. In 1260 he produced the famous pulpit in the baptistery at Pisa. In 1265 he began the Arca di San Domenico at Bologna, in which he was assisted by Fra Guglielmo Agnelli. In 1266 he began the pulpit of the cathedral at Siena, assisted by his son Giovanni and his pupils Arnolfo del Cambio, Donato, and Lapo. It is similar to the one in Pisa, but larger, and octagonal instead of hexagonal. In 1269 Charles of Anjou commissioned him to erect the abbey and convent of La Scorgola to commemorate the victory of Tagliacozzo, which occurred in the neighbouring valley. He also began the fountain in Perugia finished by his son Giovanni. The 24 statuettes of this fountain which are ascribed to Niccola Pisano are simply designed and broadly treated.

Pisistratidæ (pis-is-trat'i-dē). Hippias and Hipparchus, the two sons and successors of Pisistratus.

Pisistratus (pi-sis'tra-tus). [Gr. Πεισίστρατος.] Born about 605 B. C.: died 527 B. C. A tyrant of Athens, a friend of Solon. He usurped the supreme power in 560; was twice expelled; and was restored and reigned until his death.

Peisistratus, in the last period of his rule (537–527 B. C.), is said to have commissioned some learned men, of whom the poet Onomacritus was the chief, to collect the poems of Homer. It is now generally believed that an Iliad and an Odyssey already existed in writing at that time, but that the text had become much deranged, especially through the practice of reciting short passages without regard to their context. Besides these two poems, many other epic poems or fragments of the Ionian school went under Homer's name. The great task of the commission was to collect off these "poems of Homer" into one body. From this general stock they may have supplied what they thought wanting in the Iliad and Odyssey. Their work existed, in many cases, have been carried in a mutilated form. But it can hardly be doubted that some systematic attempt to preserve "the poems of Homer" was made in the reign of Peisistratus. Jebb, Greek Lit., p. 32.

Piso (pī'sō), Calpurnius. The name of a family distinguished in Roman history. Among its members were the following: Lucius, a censor, consul, and author of the second half of the 2d century B. C.; Lucius, a politician, father-in-law of Julius Cæsar; Cneius, governor of Syria under Tiberius, and the reputed author of the poisoning for four days, put to death by Otho (69 A. D.).

He visited Brazil in 1836, and the Andes in 1846, and in 1848 was made official geologist of Chile. He published "Géographie Physique du Chile," was published in 1876, and he wrote many reports and papers, principally on South American geology.

Pistoia, or Pistoja (pis-tō'yä). A town in the province of Florence, Italy, near the Ombrone, 20 miles northwest of Florence: the Roman Pistoria. It has manufactures of iron and firearms. The cathedral is an interesting church of the 12th and 13th centuries. The porch crosses the entire front; it has 7 round arches on slender columns, the central arch much the highest. Above the porch are 2 tiers of arcades, the first open, and the front-walls of the aisle-roofs have ranges of columns without arches. The interior is modernized, but preserves good antique and sculpture, and has a magnificent medieval silver altar with admirable statues and reliefs. The campanile is solid below, and has above 3 rounded stories with mullioned windows in pointed spire. The baptistery, the Palazzo Pretorio, and several other buildings are also of interest. Catiline was defeated and slain near the city in 62 B. C. It was noted for the middle ages for factional strife. Population (1881), 20,190; commune, 54,552.

Pitt (pit), William, first Earl of Chatham. Born at Westminster, Nov. 15, 1708: died at Hayes, Kent, May 11, 1778. A famous English Whig statesman and orator. He was the son of Robert Pitt of Boconnock, in Cornwall; studied at Trinity College, Oxford; and obtained a cornet's commission in the dragoons. He entered Parliament in 1735, and in 1746 became vice-treasurer of Ireland in the Pelham administration. He was in the same year promoted to the office of paymaster-general, which he retained under the Duke of Newcastle. Disappointed in his hope of advancement, he attacked the government in 1755, and was deprived of office. He was secretary of state under the Duke of Devonshire 1756–57. In 1757 he formed a coalition with the Duke of Newcastle, who became prime minister, and, at his accession to power, obtained the ascendancy in the government. He adopted vigorous measures in prosecution of the Seven Years' War, and the period which followed is one of the most brilliant in English history. He resigned in 1761, inasmuch as he failed to receive the support of the rest of the ministry for a war with Spain. He became one of the chief of the Rockingham in 1766, and was created Viscount Pitt and Earl of Chatham. He resigned in 1768, owing to ill health. His last speech in the House of Lords was made April 2, 1778, in support of peace with the American colonies.

Pitt, William. Born at Hayes, near Bromley, Kent, May 28, 1759: died at Putney, Jan. 23, 1806. A celebrated English Whig statesman. He was the second son of William Pitt, earl of Chatham, and Lady Hester Grenville, daughter of Earl Temple. In 1773 he entered Cambridge (Pembroke Hall). In 1780 he was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn and elected member of Parliament for Appleby. On May 26, 1781, he made his first speech in favor of Burke's plan of economical reform. In a speech, May 7, 1782, he attacked the existing electoral system and its inequalities, being defeated by a narrow majority. In July, 1782, he became chancellor of the exchequer and leader of the House of Commons in Shelburne's ministry, which resigned March 31, 1783. On the downfall of the ministry of North and Fox, Pitt became prime minister, first lord of the treasury, and chancellor of the exchequer (Dec., 1783). He was member for Cambridge in 1784. Pitt's third administration continued until 1801. The French Revolution in 1789 was at first regarded with favor in England, and as late as the spring of 1792 Pitt hoped for peace. When finally dragged into the struggle (1793–93), his activity was political rather than military. His policy was frustrated by Napoleon on the Continent, but at home it met with no opposition. In 1799 the largest possible minority in Parliament was 28. His internal administration was extremely severe. Jacobinism was suppressed, and the Habeas Corpus Act repeatedly suspended. His policy in Ireland led to the union of 1800. His attempt to relieve Roman Catholic disabilities was opposed by the king, and he resigned March 14, 1801. The Addington ministry which succeeded, was made up of Pitt's supporters. It fell after the failure of the treaty of Amiens, and Pitt's second administration began May 12, 1804. Napoleon's attempted invasion of England failed through the vigilance of Nelson, but the coalition of England, Russia, and Austria, with which Pitt opposed him on the Continent, were wrecked by the surrender of Ulm in 1805. Pitt was completely prostrated by the defeat at Austerlitz; retired to his villa at Putney Jan. 11, 1806; and died there.

The capital of the department of Piura, situated near the coast in lat. 5° 12′ S. It was founded by Pizarro. Population, about 10,000.

Pius (pī'us). I. Bishop of Rome 142–156.

Pius II. (Enea Silvio Piccolomini, Latinized as Æneas Sylvius). Born near Siena, Italy, Oct. 18, 1405; died Aug. 15, 1464. Pope 1458–64. He studied at the universities of Siena and Florence, and in 1431 became secretary to the bishop of Fermo, whom he accompanied to the Council of Basel. He at first supported the council in its contest with Pope Eugenius IV., but afterward sided with Eugenius against the council. He was for a time in the service of the emperor Frederick III. He was appointed cardinal in 1456, and ascended the papal throne in 1458. He wrote an erotic novel ("Historia de duobus Amantibus," and "Commentaries" relating to his own times.

Pius III. (Francesco Todeschini). Born at Siena, Italy, 1439; died Oct. 18, 1503. Pope Sept.–Oct., 1503.

Pius IV. (Giovanni Angelo Medici). Born at Milan, 1499; died Dec. 9, 1565. Pope 1559–65. He reopened the Council of Trent in 1562, and issued a bull confirming its decisions in 1564.

Pius V. (Michele Ghislieri). Born at Bosco, near Milan, 1504; died May 1, 1572. Pope 1566–1572.

Pius VI. (Giovanni Angelo Braschi). Born at Cesena, Italy, Dec. 27, 1717; died at Valence, France, Aug. 29, 1799. He was elected Pope, but was invaded by the French in 1796 and in 1798. In the latter year he was carried as a prisoner to Valence, in France, where he died.

Pius VII. (Gregorio Luigi Barnaba Chiaramonti). Born at Cesena, Italy, Aug. 14, 1742; died Aug. 20, 1823. Pope 1800–23. He ratified the concordat with France in 1801, and consecrated Napoleon as emperor in 1804. His opposition to French aggression brought on the annexation of the Papal States to France in 1809, and his own imprisonment first in Italy and afterward in France 1809–14. He was restored to Rome and to his dominions in the latter year.

Pius VIII. (Francesco Xaviero Castiglioni). Born at Cingoli, near Ancona, Italy, Nov. 20, 1761; died at Rome, Nov. 30, 1830. Pope 1829–1830.

Pius IX. (Giovanni Maria Mastai Ferretti). Born at Sinigaglia, near Ancona, Italy, May 13, 1792; died at Rome, Feb. 7, 1878. Pope 1846–1878. He became archbishop of Spoleto in 1827; was appointed cardinal in 1840; and ascended the papal throne in 1846. His grand object at his accession was to bring about a confederation of the Italian states under the papal supremacy. With this object in view, he placed himself at the head of the movement for reform, proclaimed an amnesty to political offenders, reorganized the municipal government of Rome, and granted a constitution to the Papal States. Frightened, however, by the increasing demands of the populace, he fled to Gaeta in Nov., 1848, while a republic was proclaimed at Rome. He was restored by the aid of the French in 1850. Henceforth he maintained an attitude of uncompromising conservatism. A large part of his dominions was annexed by Victor Emmanuel in 1860, and he was altogether deprived of his temporal power in 1870. Through his influence the doctrine of papal infallibility was adopted by the Vatican Council, July 18, 1870.
